Violence awareness raised by vigil

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Despite the chill, a small crowd gathered Saturday night in City Park Pavilion for a candlelight vigil in conjunction with National Domestic Violence Awareness Month.

There are vigils all across the country during the month of October, said Anne Woodmansee, coordinator of the event, which was sponsored by the Crisis Center Inc.

The Crisis Center serves victims of domestic violence and sexual assault in the Manhattan area.

In 1990, the center sheltered 228 people and received 1,346 crisis calls, Director Kim Blubaugh said.

Guest speaker Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, announced that a mandatory arrest law has been passed by the 1991 Kansas Legislature.

The law, which goes into effect Jan. 1, 1992, will require law enforcement agencies to have written policies making arrests mandatory in situations where there is visible evidence that a crime — battery, for example — has been committed.

Hochhauser said she praised advocacy groups for their help in getting the law passed and urged them to keep legislators informed.

Gorbachev, Bush pledge to reduce arms

Nations move beyond negotiations, now fear renegades

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Pledges of sweeping arms cuts by the U.S. and Soviet presidents reflect their belief that the superpowers now face less threat from each other than from renegades with nuclear weapons.

George Bush and Mikhail Gorbachev have moved beyond the arduous negotiations that characterized decades of U.S.-Soviet arms control and are instead announcing unilateral steps.

Significantly, they made their promises before either side had ratified the Strategic Arms Reduction Treaty, which was negotiated very painfully over nearly a decade and was signed at the Moscow summit in July.

A member of a delegation led by U.S. Undersecretary of State Reginald Bartholomew that arrived in Moscow on Saturday to discuss the nuclear cuts said both sides had accomplished more in one week than in five years of negotiations. The official spoke on condition of anonymity.

Bush, while acting unilaterally to scrap and mothball some American nuclear weapons, also wants to dismantle Iraq's atomic potential. Gorbachev also is backing U.N. efforts to deny Iraq the bomb.

chances of Soviet extremists seizing nuclear arms for use in domestic turmoil. Bush shares that goal and paved the way for Gorbachev by announcing unilateral U.S. steps a week ago.

Although the leaders are united in their major objectives, each tilted their promises to favor his country.

Bush sought to defuse Soviet demands for talks on naval arms control by announcing he was pulling tactical nuclear weapons off many American vessels but not destroying all of them.

Gorbachev met Bush by removing short-range nuclear weapons from Soviet vessels and raised the ante, offering to open talks on destroying them. He also vowed to remove from service three nuclear missile submarines with 48 missiles.

Gorbachev called a long-standing U.S. bluff, made originally by President Reagan in 1983, for the super-

New visa lottery begins next week

Critics charge new program arbitrary, favors certain countries

HILARY GANT

Some charge that a new lottery for granting visas to immigrants is unfair and favors applicants from certain countries.

Critics claim the selection process is arbitrary and that some immigrants — most prominently Irish and Europeans — are overrepresented.

The new AA-1 Immigrant Lottery Program, which begins next week, processes visas similar to other lotteries and is supposed to make up for a previous discrepancy.

The discrepancy was created in 1965, when Congress lifted some restrictions for immigrants from Asia and Latin America.

Since then, immigration from 34 countries, mostly European, has been "adversely affected" by the law, according to a State Department bulletin.

This is not the first visa lottery, but critics argue this lottery may be unfair due to the large percentage of Irish immigrants who will receive visas.

The 1990 law creating the AA-1 lottery was co-sponsored by Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., and specifies that 16,000 or 40 percent of the visas must go to natives of the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland.

"This either corrects a previous problem, or it's biased," said Marjory Gooding, foreign student adviser at the University of Colorado.

Gooding is a member of the Association of International Educators. She is in charge of informing the Western region of the national asso-

More than 100 students affected; most will not apply

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

International students at K-State who come from countries previously identified as "adversely affected" by 1965 immigration reform legislation can apply for U.S. residency under the new AA-1 Immigrant Visa Program.

The visa lottery, which runs Oct. 14-20, is a means for immigrants from 34 countries to compete for 40,000 visas.

K-State has students enrolled from 16 of the 34 countries eligible for the visas. As of spring 1991 there were 106 students from countries on the State Department list that could submit the AA-1 application.

"I think it's a real crap shoot," said

Donna Davis, K-State's foreign student adviser.

"If someone applies and gets lucky, it's just like winning the lottery," Davis said.

She said it might raise expectations only to have them unfulfilled.

"I do think students need to know about it so they have a chance to apply," Davis said.

She said the International Student Center has been getting letters from attorneys in New York which claim that for $100 they can increase a client's chance of winning the lottery by delivering the application directly to the post office in Virginia or by sending in multiple applications.

"They're saying Oct. 14 is the day to do it. You have to mail 10 a day or 100 a day, hoping it gets there," Davis said.

Though some will apply, she said, most of the foreign students at K-State probably won't because they Manhattan youth dies from gunshot

TRISTAN MOHN
Staff Writer

A Manhattan youth died Sunday from gunshot wounds received Saturday night.

William James Pasko, 16, was shot in the forehead at about 10 p.m. Saturday at 526 Bertrand St.

Pasko was taken to Memorial Hospital. He was then transferred to Stormont-Vail in Topeka, where he later died, Riley County Police Sgt. K.W. Padgett said.

The police are investigating the case and have a suspect in mind, Padgett said, but have not made any arrests.

"We have identified the suspect and have spoken to him," he said. "We just need to continue the investigation to see if this warrants criminal charges."

Demonstrators form 'life chain'

Pro-lifers peacefully line up on both sides of Bluemont Avenue

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

About 400 peaceful pro-life demonstrators formed a "life chain" along four blocks of Bluemont Avenue Sunday afternoon.

Life chain participants stood in a single line down each side of the street from Third Street to Juliette Avenue holding white signs that had "Abortion Kills Children" written on them in red letters.

There was no organized counter demonstration, but a house at Sixth Street and Bluemont Avenue displayed a pro-choice sign in a window.

"A few people yell (pro-choice things) as they drive by, but it's been really peaceful," said Alan Oberley, senior in secondary education and member of Students for Life.

Similar demonstrations occurred in about 300 U.S. cities Sunday, which Oberley said was designated as Respect Life Sunday. Wichita and Kansas City also had life chain demonstrations.

Students for Life and Manhattan Kansans for Life coordinated the Manhattan event.

Oberley distributed signs to participants and asked them not to talk to people who weren't part of the chain but to send them to an organizer.

He said the chain was a silent message to the city that abortion is wrong.

"Abortion kills children. We're just here to witness that fact to the community," Oberley said.

Life chains have been going on in the United States for several years, but this was the first in Manhattan.

Lori Hobbs, Manhattan resident and Kansans for Life member, said the recent abortion protests by Operation Rescue in Wichita weren't a factor in bringing the life chain to Manhattan this year.

"We don't have any kind of official stance on Operation Rescue," Hobbs said of her group.

"We stand with people across the United States who are all showing their stand against abortion today."

Manhattan residents Norman and Betty Wallace said they joined the chain because they oppose abortion as a form of birth control. They said they do not belong to any pro-life organization.

"Abortion is a lousy way of contraception," Betty Wallace said.

"We believe life begins at gestation, not when it (the baby) hits the air."

Dentist may have spread patient's virus

SEATTLE (AP) — A dentist blamed for giving five patients the AIDS virus may have passed it from one patient to another in at least one instance, Health and Human Services Secretary Louis H. Sullivan said Sunday.

Sullivan's comment was the first suggestion by a top federal official of patient-to-patient transmission by Dr. David J. Acer of Stuart, Fla., who died of acquired immune deficiency syndrome in September 1990.

"Unfortunately, this dentist did not use very strong aseptic techniques — did not use rubber gloves, for instance," Sullivan said at a news conference.

Investigators found that at least one of the five patients believed to have contracted the human immu-nodeficiency virus in Acer's office had a different strain from that of the dentist, Sullivan said.

That could mean there was a sixth patient who already had AIDS and whose virus was passed on by Acer.

But Sullivan stressed that the idea of transmission from one patient to another is far from proven.

"We do not know that this is the case in fact," Sullivan said.

Sullivan didn't name the investigator who developed the theory but noted the Acer case has come under intense scrutiny since it surfaced earlier this year.

He also didn't say which patient or patients had shown different strains of the HIV virus, which causes AIDS.

Taylor marries construction worker

LOS OLIVOS, Calif. (AP) — Elizabeth Taylor took her eighth walk down the aisle Sunday, marrying construction worker Larry Fortensky in a ceremony before Hollywood's chosen few at pop singer Michael Jackson's lavish ranch.

Taylor was given away by Jackson, a close friend, and her eldest son, Michael Wilding, at a wooden gazebo at the Neverland ranch in the Santa Ynez Valley wine country, 100 miles northwest of Los Angeles. Lifestyle guru Marianne Williamson performed the ceremony.

Jackson publicist Lee Solters, who attended the wedding, said the ceremony was "very simple." An airborne gatecrasher provided the most dramatic moment by parachuting into the compound, Solters said. The unidentified man was handcuffed and led away.

Taylor, 59, announced in July that she was marrying the 39-year-old Fortensky. She professed her love and devotion and promised: "This is it!"

Exclusive coverage deals were made with photographer Herb Ritts and gossip columnist Liz Smith. Sales of the material were expected to fetch millions of dollars for AIDS research.

Lie on your resume, Stallone says

CHARLOTTESVILLE, Va. (AP) — Sylvester Stallone's advice to a group of drama students was as direct as a Rocky Balboa uppercut: Tell lies on your resume.

"That's very important; you must lie," Stallone told a University of Virginia audience Friday.

"That's not what we teach them here," drama professor Bob Chapel interrupted.

Stallone had other pointers.

"You have to have blind faith in yourself," he said. It also helps to "make friends with depression and failure."

And there was this practical advice: "Don't just be an actor if you can be more."

Stallone visited the Charlottesville campus because of his interest in Edgar Allan Poe, who attended the university.

Pro-lifers protest in Wichita

WICHITA (AP) — Thousands of people holding identical "Abortion Kills Children" signs lined the intersection of two major streets here Sunday for about an hour.

Sixteen other Kansas cities and towns also scheduled "life chains" as part of a national day of pro-life demonstrations. Figures on participation statewide could not be obtained Sunday night.

Organizers claimed a turnout of about 13,000 in Wichita, a figure that Wichita police Capt. Jack Leon said "probably is a little bit inflated."

The demonstrators stood at arms length or closer along one side of the two streets. The lines, with a few gaps, stretched about 4 miles north and south and about 5 miles east and west.

Car club seeks to develop team

National level of competition organization's goal

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

Members of the K-State Sports Car Club are working to develop the first National Collegiate Motorsports Team.

"Unlike other sports, there is not a collegiate avenue for getting involved in motorsports racing," said Bert Biles, Bureau of General Research consultant and K-State club adviser. "We hope to play a hand in creating that."

The NCMT project was conceived in March 1991 by a group of club members and Biles, who have organized its initial stages.

The club is finishing a proposal to be presented to some U.S. corporations asking for sponsorship and support.

The funds gained through sponsorship will be used to provide 12 full and several partial scholarships to future racing team members.

Members will be recruited on a nationwide basis.

"We will recruit members like any other sports team. We'll be looking for experience, aptitude and commitment," said Biles, who currently competes on the racing circuit in the Sports 2000 racing class.

"Driver testing at Heartland Park in Topeka will probably be a part of our driver recruiting."

He said experience in disciplines besides motorsports is also important to the club.

The 12 members on full scholarships would be divided into three groups: engineering performance, performance driving and media/marketing.

The club has enlisted the help of several K-State faculty for public relations and sports psychology.

The team goal is to compete on a professional level.

"If we can prove we can build one collegiate team, then we'll start a national race for nothing but collegiate teams," said Todd Puckett, senior in mechanical engineering and club president.

Club members said they hope the team will be able to compete in the 1992 Firestone Firehawk series, which begins in early spring and ends in October.

"Whether the team does compete in the series is dependent on how quickly the club receives corporate support," Puckett said.

If acquiring the funds takes longer than expected, the team will compete in selected races at the end of 1992 and focus on the Firestone Firehawk series in 1993.

Two race cars were donated to the club last year.

Puckett said the first car donated, a Datsun 510, will require some work before it is ready for competition, and the other, a Yamaha-powered racing cart, is race ready.

The team will be coached by other professionals.

"We will initially draw our coaches from experienced drivers in the Sports Car Club of America from throughout the Midwest," Biles said.

One of those coaches is Bill Noble, Manhattan resident and three-time national champion in the SCCA Formula Vee class.

The International Motorsports Association has offered the club assistance in organizing the project.

Thomas accused of harassment

Democrats say allegations serious, vote may be delayed

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas "very forcefully denied" allegations by a law professor that he sexually harassed her when she worked for him a decade ago, a Republican senator said Sunday.

The White House dismissed the accusations as "unfounded."

But Democratic senators called the accusations very serious and one said a delay in Tuesday's scheduled confirmation vote might be necessary.

Thomas himself made no comment on the allegations by Anita Hill. The allegations were first disclosed by National Public Radio and Newsday.

The University of Oklahoma law professor told the Judiciary Committee last month that Thomas had detailed scenes from pornographic movies to her when she worked in the early 1980s as his legal assistant at the Department of Education and the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, according to a source familiar with the allegations.

Hill told the committee that Thomas had asked her out and when she refused, he began to describe his sexual interests and the pornographic scenes, but he never touched her, the source said.

The committee did not disclose Hill's allegations publicly before sending Thomas' nomination to the full Senate late last month without recommendation. The committee told the White House of the accusations and a two-day FBI probe ensued.

While Thomas maintained his silence, the White House issued a statement saying it had "reviewed the (FBI) report and determined that the allegation was unfounded."

The White House said President Bush "continues to believe that Judge Thomas is eminently qualified to serve on the Supreme Court and expects him to be confirmed promptly."

A Senate vote had been scheduled for Tuesday, and a majority of senators had indicated their support for Thomas, a conservative appeals judge who would become the second black to sit on the nation's highest court, succeeding the retired Justice Thurgood Marshall.

Sen. Joseph Biden Jr., D-Del., chairman of the Judiciary Committee, could not be reached for comment on Hill's allegations or on the committee's handling of it.

But Sen. Howard Metzenbaum, D-Ohio, called the allegation "very serious charges, very disturbing" and said the full Senate should review them before voting on Thomas' nomination.

Sen. Paul Simon, D-Ill., hopes senators' questions on the matter can be addressed before Tuesday's scheduled vote, but if they cannot be, the senator "believes it's important enough that it might be necessary to delay the vote," said Simon's press secretary, David Carle.

Seminar benefits small businesses

Program highlights legal considerations, plan development

BECKY SCHROEDER
Collegian Reporter

The K-State Small Business Development Center is conducting a seminar for small business owners and people who want to establish or buy a small business.

The four-week seminar, "Starting a Small Business in Kansas," began Sept. 18 and will continue through Wednesday in the SBDC conference room at 2323 Anderson Ave.

Seminar topics include how to develop a business plan, legal considerations of owning and operating a small business, financial and marketing management, record keeping, taxes and personnel relations.

A group of eight small business owners and potential owners were at the Sept. 26 session.

Cynthia Augustine, Merle Norman Cosmetics representative, said she was trying to get tips on how to enhance her business in Junction City. She said she thought the course would be beneficial.

There are also seminar sessions about small business ownership outside Kansas. Hilde Bare, who attended one of these sessions, said he wants to open a restaurant in the Ozarks.

"It is definitely worth the money," Bare said.

The cost of the course is $45, which includes a checklist notebook, a business plan guideline and other information needed to operate a business.

Jack Jankovich, instructor of management and business consultant, teaches the seminar.

Other seminars and events sponsored by the SBDC this semester include the "Home-Based Business Fair" and "Marketing Basics for Small Business" in November.

Spikers stick together

The note landed on my desk the other day. I knew it was coming. "What the hell is going on with the volleyball team?" it read. I stopped reading. No need to finish. This was one of those situations when an interested reader said, "Jump," and I said, "How high?"

So I went to Ahearn Field House on Saturday.

This has been an interesting four weeks for following K-State volleyball, to say the least. Growing pains, finger pointing, harsh words, unhappy players — all the things that ooze with slime when it appears in a newspaper.

And that's all off the court.

Regardless, when varsity players hang it up for whatever reasons, people want to know why. Hell, I do, too. That's why this sports staff won't cheat you when a bomb falls on the athletic department.

Still, there's a group of volleyball players trying to hold what's left of the Wildcat program together. At least, that's what I saw Saturday in the Cats' match with UMKC.

It's probably easy to gather false impressions when K-State plays a team like the Kangaroos. Simply put: The Roos ain't very good.

But UMKC wasn't under my microscope Saturday. K-State was. And here's what passed before this writer's naked eyes:

- Patti Hagemeyer is not an ogre.
- The Cats haven't folded their tent.

- It's a strange atmosphere at a K-State volleyball game.

The players who quit may disagree with the first observation. Some of the current players may disagree as well. But Hagemeyer applauded good plays, supported failed attempts with encouragement and even found time for a smile or two.

I also saw mannerisms that could possibly bother some players. Hagemeyer addressed players by their last names, didn't burst with emotion from start to finish and maintained a cold stare when observing her team's performance.

Tough treatment for players who aren't used to it. But unreasonable? Draw your own conclusions.

Try as I might to avoid preconceived ideas, a few existed when I entered Ahearn. I expected to see a group afraid of failure and the wrath of their coach. I expected any sign of adversity to gobble up the Cats. I wondered if K-State's quality of effort would suffer after a trying month.

The answers to these questions: no, no and no.

There were no signs of an NCAA champion in the making, but the mood was upbeat. No griping among players, no panic when things weren't going right. It even looked like the group was having fun during a 15-0 second-game rout of the Kangaroos.

The only negative thing that appeared Saturday was the atmosphere, and that's to be expected. People are skeptical about K-State volleyball right now, and it's easy to sense. Willie the Wildcat could have parachuted from the catwalk above Ahearn and would have been lucky to get acknowledged.

K-State is 6-10 overall and 0-3 in Big Eight matches. Hagemeyer said she expects better things from her team during the remainder of the season.

It can only be hoped that her forecast is correct. That way, good news on the court can replace the bad news off of it.

Cats continue learning process

Bietau likes team's effort in tourney

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

For the K-State women's tennis team, this was a weekend for learning.

With five new players on the roster this season, Coach Steve Bietau realized that might be the case when KU, Oklahoma State and Wichita State came to town for the K-State Invitational.

"It was not a disappointing weekend at all," Bietau said. "I saw a lot of things that we need to work on, but there was a lot of improvement in comparison to last week (at Nebraska)."

One of the most noted improvements was the play of Michele Riniker.

The sophomore from Unterkulm, Switzerland, made it to the finals of the No. 2 singles competition, where she lost to Alison Vaughn of Oklahoma State, 4-6, 7-6 (7-3), 6-4, in a match that lasted more than three hours.

"It was the best match that I've seen her play so far this year," Bietau said. "I think she realizes that she played well, but she is still disappointed that she lost and that's good."

"Her serve was more consistent, there was more consistency in her overall game and she controlled herself more throughout the match."

Riniker was on the downside after her marathon match, but still felt good about her performance.

"I just felt like I played that long for nothing," she said. "But I played some of my best tennis, and I just let a few points get away."

In No. 1 singles play, freshman Karin Lusnic defeated teammate and fellow freshman Mareke Plocher for fifth place, 2-6, 6-4, 7-6 (7-5). Bietau said the tournament provided the kind of matches he hopes to see in the future if it comes down to matches against teammates.

"It was not the best playing I've seen her do, but she did play hard, and I liked seeing that," he said. "Sometimes when we play against each other it makes it easier, and other times it makes it harder. But it shouldn't make a difference."

In other action, sophomore Neili

Senior Neili Wilcox returns a serve during the four-team K-State Invitational Saturday at Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. Wilcox finished fourth in the No. 2 singles competition.

J. KYLE WYATT/Staff

Wilcox took fourth in the No. 2 singles flight, losing to Jackie Gunthorp of Oklahoma State, 6-0, 2-6, 6-2. In the No. 3 singles flight, junior Suzanne

Sim defeated freshman teammate Sarah Brooks for third, 4-3, 6-4, 6-4. In the No. 4 singles flight, freshman Amy Grantham defeated freshman Martine Shrubsole for third place 4-6, 6-4, 6-1.

In No. 1 doubles action, Lusnic

Golfers recover for 10th

ERIC BROWN

Considering the weather conditions the K-State men's golf team battled this weekend, one would not have blamed the Wildcats for folding up their golf bags and heading home from the Rockies.

But fold they did not, and for the first time this season, the Cats met their tournament goals. The team placed 10th in the 23-team Falcon Invitational in Colorado Springs.

"We were hoping for a top-10 finish, and that's what we got, so we're pleased," Coach Mark Elliott said.

For the third time in three starts, K-State had a tough first round, posting a score of 331. But that could hardly be faulted, considering the 40-degree temperatures and snow.

After that first round, K-State was positioned in an uncomfortable 18th place.

"Our first round hurt us again," Elliott said. "We still need a couple of guys to step up."

But this time, the poor opening round was overcome by two solid rounds Saturday and Sunday, as K-State posted scores of 307 each day.

The pleasing team finish was not the only first, however, as junior Richard Laing stepped up with a promising finish.

Laing placed fourth, finishing four strokes off the leader's pace with a score of 76-74-72-223.

"Rich had a great tournament," Elliott said. "At the first two meets, he entered the last round in position to win, and this time he came through with a solid round and really picked up some confidence."

Sophomores Will Siebert and Chad Judd scored 89-76-82-247 and 85-89-77-251, respectively, and freshman Brett Waldman posted 84-74-89-247.

Harriers dominate Loyola Invitational

Trask, Treiber lead respective teams to titles

They're back, and they've taken up right where they left off.

The K-State men's and women's cross country teams returned to action Saturday after nearly a month-long layoff from competition.

The results were not unlike those of the first meet. K-State dominated in both the men's and women's divisions, moving to a sweep of the Loyola-Lakefront Invitational in Chicago.

Coach John Capriotti said before the meet that the event should give his teams a legitimate test. But following the romp, he said he might have been wrong.

"The meet wasn't as good as I thought it would be," he said. "But, on the other hand, we were pretty good. We won and ran a lot better in both races than we did at Wichita State."

The victories Saturday found K-State displaying much of the same dominance that it did at Wichita State in early September. The Wildcat men knocked off host Loyola by 18 points, and the Cats' women easily outdistanced Eastern Kentucky by 46 points.

The races were contested on the shores of Lake Michigan with 40-degree temperatures and a stiff wind, Capriotti said.

"The wind off the lake was pretty tough," he said. "It kept teams from going out really strongly."

Another thing that may have hampered team performances, Capriotti said, was the configuration of the starting line.

"It was a funny starting line," he said. "The ones who started on the left were at an extreme disadvantage. It was so far to the first turn."

The K-State men caught a break in their race, starting on the more favorable right side. When all was said and done, the Cats had four of the top 10 runners on the men's side, with Todd Trask bringing home the individual crown in a time of 24 minutes, 37 seconds.

Other K-State men in the top 10 were Ron Smith, third; Mike Becker, seventh; and Anthony Williams, 10th. Freshman Billy Wuggazer rounded out the Cats who comprised the team score, finishing 13th.

Yared Berhane, Jason Goertzen and Jared Storm also competed in the men's race for K-State, finishing 17th, 32nd and 82nd, respectively.

Capriotti said he was pleased with the effort of the men.

"The Loyola team we beat was fourth at the big Notre Dame invitational last week," he said, "and we really thought that was a good invitational. To beat a team like that says something for our men."

As impressive as the K-State men were, the women may have been just as impressive, if not more.

In easily outdistancing their nearest rivals, the Cats got strong individual performances from three women who placed in the top 10.

Finishing second overall was Janet Treiber, in a time of 18:25. Paulette Staats was right on

Volleyball team splits matches

Despite a lineup change before Friday's match against Iowa State, the K-State volleyball team couldn't stop its Big Eight losing streak.

The addition of defensive specialist Alison Mott failed to help the Wildcats against the Cyclones, as Iowa State won the match in three games, 15-4, 15-6 and 15-7 in Ahearn Field House.

The Wildcats managed to end the slide Saturday, sweeping UMKC 15-12, 15-0 and 15-6. In that match, freshman Kara Murray got her first playing time for K-State, which improved to 6-10 on the season.

Iowa State dominated Friday's match from the start. While K-State attempted to get settled, the Cyclones built an 11-3 lead. The Cats were unable to rally, losing the first game 15-4.

Still, K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said she was satisfied with the team's effort overall.

"It was a very fast match, but that was the best match I have ever seen of that team," she said. "I think we played a great defense, and we started to balance the court line."

"I think that is what K-State volleyball is going to be all about — a real quick tempo and a quick defense."

The second game was almost a copy of the first.

Iowa State raced to a 14-5 lead, but K-State didn't go down quietly.

Sophomore Angie McKee led the charge with six kills and a service ace, as K-State warded off seven set

It lacked the lights and flair of the World Wrestling Federation, but for the contestants, it was a chance to have a moment in the spotlight.

Friday night was the all-University Intramural Wrestling Championships at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services, said what the meet lacked in numbers it made up for in quality.

"We were down a little bit in numbers compared to last year, but we had a lot of former state champions out there," Martini said. "They made for some really good matches that were close."

One of those matches was the 134-pound match between Joe Guillory, sophomore in electrical engineering, and Nathan Rodriguez, senior in chemistry education.

"I remember teaching wrestling to this kid when he was younger," said the 24-year-old Rodriguez. "I didn't know what to expect going into it. I helped coach him to state championship a couple of years ago when he was at Manhattan High, but I'm not over the hill yet."

Minorities prepare for more education

Symposium offers suggestions for graduate school

DEDRA MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Eighty-five minority students attended a symposium this weekend aimed at preparing minority students for graduate school.

"Minority Graduate Education: The Path to Leadership," sponsored by the Kansas Board of Regents institutions, was Saturday in the K-State Union Little Theater.

Numerous speakers and workshops helped students prepare educationally, mentally and financially for graduate work.

Joseph Bast, associate dean of graduate studies and research at the University of Kansas Medical Center, said students should want to go to graduate school for several reasons — most importantly to grow and develop as a student and contributing member of society.

Workshops focused on how to explore the value of a graduate education in today's world, how to select and apply to graduate school, where to find sources of financial assistance and strategies for surviving graduate school.

"You have to have the desire to want to do it," Bast said.

Bast said three of the main reasons for offering symposiums like this are to provide the students with information, stimulate their imaginations and offer as much encouragement as possible.

"We think it is necessary in Kansas to increase the pool for advanced degrees and to include more membership in faculty and student government," said Robert Sanders, associate dean of the University of Kansas' graduate school.

Most students chosen to attend the symposium were called the "talented tenth" because their grade point averages were 3.00 or better.

Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs, said K-State students were required to have a GPA of 2.50 or more, because most students who attended were sophomores and juniors who still had time to bring up their GPAs.

during one week in fiscal years 1992, 1993 and 1994.

The first 40,000 qualifying applicants who get their applications to a post office in Arlington, Va., will receive, or "win," permanent visas.

The first of the three lotteries begins at 12:01 a.m. EDT, Oct. 14, and ends at 11:59 p.m. EDT, Oct. 20.

Attorneys throughout the country, some charging hundreds of dollars for the service, are going to the Arlington post office to hand deliver applications for the visas and tell their clients the personal attention may increase their odds of acquiring the visas.

Howard Eisberg, a Kansas City, Mo., immigration lawyer, sent an informational letter to his clients and to the International Student Center at K-State. Eisberg is not one of the lawyers charging for special services during the lottery.

"I don't know if it will be an advantage or not to send someone to Arlington," Eisberg said. "I feel a person has just as much of a chance on their own as they do with a lawyer."

Eisberg said one Kansas City-area church is raising money to cover the cost of sending one person to take a pool of applications from Kansas to Virginia in hopes that it will help.

For more information about the lottery, call the State Department's visa hotline at (202) 663-1600.

The K-State Frisbee™ team members have chosen to call themselves the Star-Bellied Sneetches, which is the name of a Dr. Seuss character.

This weekend, the team competed against teams from Kansas, Missouri, Nebraska and Iowa at a University of Kansas tournament.

After playing six games Saturday, the Sneetches advanced to the quarterfinals, which put them in fourth place. Their record for the day was 2-4.

"We were the only collegiate team to advance to the quarterfinals," said Taylor Mali, graduate student in English.

The Sneetches lost their first game Sunday, ending their participation in the tournament.

"We were one game away from being invited to the regional tournament, which is in two weeks," Mali said.

The Sneetches compete against 12 universities during the regular season. The competitors are Big Eight schools and other colleges from surrounding states.

The Frisbee™ team has 25 graduate and undergraduate members. Most of the members are men, but there are a few women.

"The team is not an official club sponsored by K-State," said Bruce Broce, sophomore in anthropology and team captain. "We are hoping we will be funded by Student Senate soon."

During the fall season, anyone can play in tournaments. During the spring season, however, all team members are required to be students.

Games are played on a football field with seven players per team, and games last about one hour.

"Playing Frisbee™ is my way of staying in good shape," Mali said. "The tournaments are taken to an extreme."

Broce said the Star-Bellied Sneetches may have a tournament at the end of October.

"A disproportionate number of visas will go to Irish immigrants.

"There is a big problem with illegal Irish immigration. Ted Kennedy is very powerful and has a big Irish constituency in Boston.

"The very nature of this law is arbitrary. It addresses a lot of Western Europe, but then countries such as Tunisia are thrown in," Gooding said.

Recent changes in the Soviet Union and Eastern Europe confuse matters even further.

"This law was put in the books before the Soviet restructuring, so applicants have to go by borders that the U.S. currently recognizes," she said.

Gooding said most of her students applying to get the visas don't expect to get one, but they will be sending in multiple entries every day up until the Oct. 14 deadline to increase their chances of being chosen.

Applicants can send in as many applications as they want. A total of 50,000 people will be registered and sent a letter notifying them that they are on the preliminary list, but only the winners will be notified by mail.

Immigrants must submit proof of an offer of employment after they are notified that they have been chosen. The lottery will be conducted plan on returning to their home countries after they graduate.

"There is a real mistaken idea that the foreign students who come here want to stay here," Davis said. "Most of them come here for an education and want to go home to be a contributing member of their society," Davis said.

Ivo Budiprabawa, junior in food science and industry, is from Surabaya, Indonesia. Indonesia is on the AA-1 list.

"I'm not going to apply because I think it's better to go back to my country," Budiprabawa said.

"If I graduate from here and go back to my home country, it's easier to get a job," he said.

Most who will apply are looking to make a permanent change in their lives.

Budiprabawa is in the United States on a student visa.

Even if the desire is there, the chances of getting a visa through the AA-1 program are slim.

Davis said even if students get chosen for the AA-1 program, they must have a job offer by the time they get through the system and go for an interview.

"That we have an immigration lottery is just a crazy concept to me," Davis said.

The application has no filing fee, but the applicant must submit the following on a plain sheet of white paper: full name, date of birth, place of birth, the name of the applicant's spouse and the names of applicant's children under the age of 21.

The applicant's current mailing address and location of the nearest U.S. consulate to the applicant's native country must also be included.

Students who want to apply can call Davis at the International Student Center at 532-6448 for more information.

Attendance policies common

Grades can be affected by absences; University allows instructors to set rules

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

With fall in full swing and rainy, cool weather beginning, some students may opt to snuggle in bed and skip classes.

But they should find out the attendance policies of their classes before shutting off the alarm and going back to sleep.

Students of Hermann Donnert, professor of nuclear engineering, will have to brave the cold. Donnert said missing his class is deadly.

He and other instructors have made good on the University's class attendance policy, which gives instructors the option of initiating their own policies.

Ken Klabunde, professor of chemistry and Faculty Senate president, said he estimates 60 to 70 percent of instructors have some form of attendance policy.

"Most faculty have some technique to encourage students to come to class," Klabunde said. "Many use incentives to get students to come to class, but others make it mandatory. For the most part, they are fairly liberal policies."

But some might question whether Donnert's policy is liberal.

Donnert said he reserves the right to dock students a letter grade if they do not come to class unless they make an A on the final.

If Donnert's students ace the final and hand in an A paper, there are no questions asked.

"I'm an old man set in my ways," Donnert said. "I don't believe in teaching straight out of the text. Students who make it this far surely know how to read."

"More than half the material taught in class is not in the text, but is information I have collected over the years. The best way to get this information is for students to come to class."

Donnert said with the large body of knowledge on the subject, an instructor must make a difficult decision on which information to teach.

Many of Donnert's lessons include information from videos, slides and overheads.

He said that after students get to his class, they had better pay attention. If students are not paying attention, he said, he reserves the right to dock them a letter grade.

"For students to miss a class," he said, "they must be a senior going to a job interview, the guest of honor at a funeral or be at the funeral of a family member."

Donnert said there were once so many grandmothers dying, he now requires students to bring a newspaper clipping of the obituary as proof.

"My policy is strict, because there's no other way for students to learn the material. If I show a video, and the student isn't in class, they don't learn the material."

"If I put up an overhead, and the student isn't in class, they don't learn."

Vigil

"Legislators are educable," Hochhauser said. "I think we do have to be informed."

Two women spoke about their personal experiences of being battered.

One of them described being stabbed and having herself and her house doused with gasoline while her children were inside. She said her husband struck a match and threw it, but it failed to ignite. The woman is now divorced, and her ex-husband is serving four to 20 years for attempted murder.

Blubaugh said it is empowering for battered women to speak out and to hear other women's stories so they know they are not alone.

"I hope it heightens awareness and compassion, and I hope anger toward the perpetrators and toward the society that makes the perpetrators," Blubaugh said.

The event also featured a date rape monologue by Penny Cullers of Graphic Arts Theatre. It also included several readings, including one by Matt Narramore, senior in political science and Women and Men Against Rape member.

Although only a few men attended the vigil, Woodmansee said she purposely invited them to participate because men are in power—they are the power structure.

"In order for society to change, the power structure must first change and begin to focus on problems like domestic violence," Woodmansee said.

Woodmansee said she felt like she was "preaching to the choir," because most of the people who attended were not those who needed to hear.

Treiber's heels, crossing the finish line just 14 seconds later. And Renee Russell ran her second consecutive strong race, finishing seventh.

Individually, the women were hurt by the same starting line that helped the men. They started on the dreaded left side, and the poor start may have hurt Treiber's and Staats' chances of winning individual titles.

"We just need to be more aggressive at the start," Capriotti said. "And you add to that the strange starting line, and you get something that's pretty tough to overcome."

Capriotti was particularly pleased with Russell's effort.

"Renee Russell has had the two best races of her career in these two meets," he said. "I'm really happy for her."

Others scoring for K-State in the women's race were Martha Pinto, 12th, and Lesley Wells, 13th. Jennifer Hillier, Amy Marx, Jeanene Rugan and Janet Magner also competed for the Cats, finishing 17th, 21st, 42nd and 47th, respectively.

Capriotti said the teams must become more race ready before their next competition, Oct. 19 at San Luis Obispo, Calif.

"We need to get tougher, more aggressive," he said. "If we can turn up the intensity of our workouts another notch, we'll be in good shape."

points. But the team could not score with the service advantage, and lost 15-6.

K-State took its first lead of the match early in the third game. But the Cyclones were able to find holes against K-State's blockers and took advantage of communication errors to regain the lead.

Iowa State coach Vicki Mealer said she was pleased with her team's play.

"It was a good win for us," she said. "We're happy to get out of here with a 3-0 win. I think we served really tough. We blocked very well, and our outside hitters played well."

But, like Hagemeyer, Mealer said she saw a K-State team that has a promising future in the Big Eight.

"K-State has a good foundation for a good team," Mealer said. "K-State has a great defense, and I think they will continue to get stronger."

"With Rhonda Hughes and Kathy Saxton, K-State has players who are able to lead the team."

"The players get pretty excited about what they do," Hagemeyer said. "I really do think that my team's performance in the second half of the Big Eight Conference is going to be, in terms of win-loss record, a lot better."

"I wouldn't take away the team's goal of reaching the Big Eight Tournament."

Hagemeyer said there were areas that K-State needed to improve.

"We had a hard time against the Cyclones' block, and we weren't hitting very well either," she said.

Saxton led K-State's offense with 12 kills, and McKee added 11. Hughes and Stephanie Liester recorded 10 digs each for the defense.

Kansas leads way in pension fund scandals

KPERS Attorney says problem is tip of iceberg

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — It started as a way to use the state pension fund to boost the Kansas economy — making loans or investing in healthy businesses. But it has mushroomed into the state's biggest scandal ever.

Although the Kansas Public Employees Retirement System remains financially sound, with a value of about $4.4 billion, known losses exceed $230 million. Experts say total losses could double or triple.

A lawsuit seeking to recover some of the losses already has been filed against one of the companies that helped manage the portfolio. A team of lawyers and investigators hired by the KPERS board of trustees is preparing to file more.

Joseph Cotchett, one of the attorneys heading that effort, told a special legislative committee investigating the scandal there would be numerous defendants, ranging from lawyers to bankers.

Cotchett said the problem is the tip of an iceberg, predicting that even greater pension-fund scandals will surface in other states with much bigger portfolios than Kansas.

"When we talk about the savings and loan crisis, we're talking about a child's bedtime story involving Toto and Dorothy and the Wicked Witch compared to the pension fund loss across this country," Cotchett said.

"I guarantee you there are a lot more people looking at the KPERS case than just the people in Kansas. You're being watched across the nation."

Some accuse Attorney General Bob Stephan and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation of delaying an inquiry. In late 1986, Kansas City Star stories about potential conflicts of interest involving Michael Russell, then-KPERS chairman, led Stephan to investigate but conclude there was no wrongdoing.

Then in 1989, Sen. Marge Petty, D-Topeka, asked state investigators to look into the pension fund. But nothing was done because the director found no evidence of criminal violations.

Stephan denies laxness but says his office is reviewing transcripts of the legislative hearings. Gov. Joan Finney has just named a special prosecutor: Thomas Sullivan, who had spent the past five months on the KPERS board.

Cyclist pedals to race his dream

Championship rewards freshman's 3 years of sacrifices

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Chris Yenkey remembers L.L. Cool J screaming "I'm gonna knock you out" through the speakers of the U.S.A. team car. He remembers himself and the five other American cyclists in their red, white and blue jerseys, trying to hide their nervousness and, at the same time, intimidate their opponents.

He also remembers the 1991 Junior World Championships in Colorado Springs as the most important race so far in his young career and those of the 240 bicycle riders from 45 different countries at the race.

"The Junior World Championships are as far as you can take junior cycling — anyone who is 18 and younger cannot go any farther," said Chris Yenkey, freshman undecided.

Yenkey made three years of sacrifices to ride in the race and the other thousands of miles on bicycle he rode through such faraway places as Uruguay and Denmark.

"I skipped everything you could skip in a teenager's life to prepare for this," he said. "I ditched homecoming, Sadies, prom — it all went down the tubes, because every weekend I was training or racing somewhere."

It was during those three years that Yenkey had to prove to the National Cycling Federation coaches that he was one of the six best under-18 road racers in the nation.

His hard work began to pay off in November 1990. He was invited, along with 21 other riders, by the National Cycling Federation to spend two weeks at the Olympic Training Center.

"The Olympic Training Center is an excellent facility," Yenkey said. "I've never seen anything like it. The sports medicine facility is just tops. If anything goes wrong with you, you just go in there and, free of charge, they'll fix you up. They love to use their supplies on you."

The coaches judged each of the riders while he was there on dedication and ability to work well with the coaches.

The 22 riders were split into two 11-man teams, and Yenkey found himself assigned to the B team.

"I really wasn't sure if I would make it to the second round," he said.

The coaches looked at early-season racing results of all the riders to decide who would be invited back in March. To check on Yenkey's performance, the coaches had to get the results from Europe.

Before the first meeting in November, Yenkey, his coach Jim Schneider, and a national team coach, decided it would be good for him to spend the spring of 1991 racing in Denmark. But first, Yenkey had to get his mom to agree with the idea.

"It took awhile to convince her," he said, laughing.

His mom, Judy Weaver, said when Yenkey first mentioned leaving high school early she was adamantly opposed.

"I said 'Absolutely not,'" she said. "The memories of your senior year are things you cannot repeat."

But Yenkey finally convinced his mom, and he successfully petitioned the Salina School Board to let him out of Salina Central High a semester early so he could go to Denmark.

Yenkey made the final 14, but couldn't go because of his trip to Denmark. When the final 10 invitations were sent out for the pre-World Trials camp in late May, however, Yenkey found himself back in Colorado Springs at the Olympic Training Center. This time the stay included riding 600-650 miles per week.

"They had us going out and blowing our brains out working like dogs," he said. "The coaches were concerned with picking the six strongest and best riders they could. It was just a huge process of proving yourself day after day."

After the qualifying races in mid-June, the team that would represent the United States was announced. Yenkey's name was not included in the top six. He, instead, was named to one of the two alternate spots.

"I was hoping to be one of the top six, but I was just happy to make the team,"

Different worlds need to be united

Harmony Week address given by Kansas City minister

JIM STRUBER
Contributing Writer

The Rev. Samuel Mann, civil rights advocate and minister of St. Marks Church in Kansas City, Mo., opened the 1991 Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week Monday morning in the K-State Union Forum Hall.

Mann delivered the keynote address by commending efforts at K-State, and throughout the nation, to celebrate harmony and diversity.

He addressed his concerns about unity and diversity among the different genders, races and cultures present in the American society. He said there was still something missing — a prior problem.

Mann used a story about a white quarterback and a black receiver to address this prior problem.

He said the two football players were striving for the same goal on the playing field by scoring points and moving the ball down the field.

"These two players demonstrate a type of unity and togetherness when they are successful," Mann said. "However, after the game is over and the celebration has died down, these two players go home to two different worlds."

Mann said these two worlds need to be addressed, because they need the unity that is now being advocated. He said there are many barriers that divide us into these two different worlds, such as sex, race, environment, poverty and class.

"Men and women still don't get along," he said. "Environment, poverty and class still divide."

Mann said there is a white-male patriarchy which dominates American society. In order for people of different gender, race and culture to make it in this world, they must act like white men, he said.

"This is an amalgamation and assimilation, and not diversity," he said.

"We all got to try and quit being like white men — ain't that something," he said. "We do have to deal with white male and privilege."

To counter the white male patriarchy, he suggested African-Americans be black, women be women and Native Americans be Native Americans so they are not co-opted.

"When you are co-opted you lose your freedom," he said, "don't let

Marijuana illegality questioned

Legalization, decriminalization worries officials; students organize advocacy group

DARLA GOODMAN
KATIE WALKER
Staff Writers

The legalization or decriminalization of marijuana possession is as hot a topic now, particularly on college campuses, as it was in the 1960s and '70s.

Some K-State students are trying to establish a local chapter of the National Organization for the Reform of Marijuana Laws.

Ten states have laws decriminalizing possession in small amounts, making it a civil offense. The offense does not go on a criminal record and carries penalties similar to traffic fines.

While no legalization legislation is before either the Kansas Legislature or Congress, health care workers, police and government officials said the possibility worries them.

"What I find disturbing is that it would condone the use of a mind-altering drug by young children, and they barely know what reality is," state Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan, said.

DRUGS

Ruth Bentivenga, a school/community consultant at the Northeast Kansas Regional Prevention Center, said she opposes legalization.

"Kids always experiment to an extent with drugs, but they need to know that they don't need a drug to have fun," she said.

Legalization advocates, however, emphasize practical uses of the drug and say legalization is an environmental and human rights issue.

Advocates also say, if the drug was legal, the government could control it more effectively with resources going to fight possession of harder drugs.

"How can they control it? It grows wild," said Sgt. Stanley Conkwright of the Riley County Police Department. "The state can't get enough people to find it and kill it. There's also the concern of what it gets mixed with. There's just no way to control it."

But advocates say keeping the drug illegal is not the solution.

"We are trying to solve America's drug problem with a different attitude," said a student involved in organizing the NORML chapter, who spoke on condition of anonymity.

"They've spent billions and billions of dollars to stop the usage of marijuana, and they've gotten nowhere," the student said. "The government, through taxation, could

Role-playing, improvisation attack prejudice against ethnic groups

Workshop examines generalizations, stereotyping

ERIN PERRY

Normano Feddero thrust his microphone before a member of the talk-show panel.

"And what's your prejudice, ma'am?" he asked.

"Oh, I'm not prejudiced at all. But I think it's very nice of you to have that colored boy down there on your show," she said pointing at the black guest on the panel.

Bigots Anonymous Workshop, a Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week event, used improvisation and role playing to address prejudice.

About 40 people participated in the workshop Monday in the K-State Union.

Norman Fedder, professor of speech, posed as the host of a talk show featuring a seven-member panel of "bigots." Each guest was prejudiced toward a different ethnic group.

Fedder, who is Jewish, repeatedly reminded the audience that the panel members were playing roles. But he said afterward that people at the workshop, including himself, were still hurt by the prejudiced guests' comments.

"(In this forum) we can address the hurt," he said. "We can try to answer it and remedy it."

After the "bigots" talked about their prejudices, it was the talk show audience's turn to ask questions and challenge them.

Valerie Marsh, graduate student in theater, portrayed the guest with anti-Native American sentiments.

Marsh said she spent the summer of 1990 working with Native Americans in Montana, which exposed her to a culture about which she had been ignorant.

"I think getting to know individuals within a certain group is the key to dissipating prejudice," Marsh said.

After playing the role of the woman who disliked Italians and Hispanics, Lynda O'Hara, junior in sociology, told the audience she grew up in the South Bronx as the daughter of an Italian immigrant. O'Hara said her character was repeating the insults she'd heard aimed at herself as a minority.

"I think people have to justify their own existence," she said of those with prejudices. "People are very afraid of what they don't understand."

Workshop participants also discussed reverse prejudice. Panel member Ron Speight, graduate student in curriculum and instruction, was the black man on the panel.

He cautioned people against hating anyone who is prejudiced against them, because neither hate is healthy.

"I think we all are prejudiced," Speight said. "My philosophy is even though I have those prejudices, I don't have to act on them."

After the role playing ended, some audience members asked those on the panel how to handle contact with prejudice.

this culture define you. If you do, you will be worshipping the gods of the white-male patriarchy."

Mann said we all have to resist the definition of this white male-dominated culture and the negative traits that are attributed to it.

These traits include colonialism, bottom-line profits and technological achievements.

"You live in a dysfunctional culture whose leaders do not know how to get us out of this mess — Democrats and Republicans," he said.

More than 100 people from K-State, the Manhattan community and students from Manhattan High School attended the speech in Forum Hall.

M. Butterfly

Tuesday, October 15, 8 p.m.

A story so bizarre it could only be true.

For 20 years a French diplomat had an affair with a Beijing opera star, who presented him with a child as a memento. But the diplomat's butterfly turned out to be quite different from the Cio Cio San of Puccini's Madama Butterfly. In this fascinating tale, David Henry Hwang takes a look at how the East and West misperceive each other and how the relations between the sexes have changed. Winner of the 1988 Tony Award for Best Play.

"Bold, intensely dramatic, thought-provoking, and stunningly presented, M. Butterfly is a play I promise you will never forget." (Newhouse Newspapers)

Depression is as common as the common cold.

Like the common cold, depression can strike anyone at any time. But, unlike the common cold, depression can be cured.

We all experience depression over the course of a lifetime, and one fourth of us experience a depression that warrants treatment. Only a third of us who could benefit from professional help seek it. For those who don't, the symptoms may fade away but are likely to recur. The sooner depression is detected and treated, the more effective the results.

As part of National Mental Illness Awareness Week, The Menninger Clinic will present a free public Depression Education Forum that features

- A presentation on depression by the Menninger professional staff
- The 30-minute film Depression: The Storm Within
- A question and answer period coordinated by Menninger mental health professionals
- A voluntary, self-administered questionnaire, and
- An opportunity, if you choose, to meet privately with a Menninger mental health professional. (This five-minute screening is designed to be informational and will provide free professional guidance, but it is not a substitute for a detailed, psychiatric evaluation.)

At Menninger we've been helping people with depression for 65 years. We invite you to learn more about this widely misunderstood and very treatable illness. This is an opportunity for you to help yourself or someone you know. No reservations are required.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Thomas Allegations deserve investigation

Throughout his confirmation hearings, Judge Clarence Thomas has ducked tough questions by claiming any answer he might give would prevent cases being brought before the Supreme Court. He says petitioners would think his mind is made up.

Apparently, it turns out, the Senate Judiciary Committee was trying to help Thomas along by not bringing up sexual harassment charges it discovered.

The charges were leveled by Anita Hill, a former aide to Thomas who is now a professor of law at the University of Oklahoma. Hill alleges Thomas made passes at her, and when she turned him down, he described to her his sexual desires.

Some committee members knew about the allegations, which were discovered by committee investigators and further investigated by the FBI.

Although the committee wanted to sweep the whole thing under the rug, someone took the initiative and asked Hill to tell her story.

Unfortunately, senators, like Dennis DeConcini, D-N.M., have responded to the charges by placing Hill on trial. It's surprising the senators haven't asked what clothes Hill wore to work to drive a man like Judge Thomas wild.

As senators prepare to vote on Thomas' nomination tonight, they should know they haven't done a thorough job of examining his character.

Harmony Week packed with opportunities for all

We don't need to write an editorial urging people to take part in planning Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week because so many have already volunteered. Organizers said people constantly dropped by the meetings to share their ideas and donate their time.

So instead, we're writing one to say "thanks" for all your hard work and to remind everyone else to get involved as well.

Take advantage of the opportunities available this week. Go to the workshops, listen to the guest speakers, watch the movies, laugh at the comedians and dance to the music.

Enjoy this week and carry the spirit into next week. And next month. And next year.

This week wasn't planned for international students or homosexuals. They seem to be the ones always struggling to fit in. This week was planned for the University as a whole in an effort to lessen that struggle.

Most prejudice and hostility stems from ignorance or misinformation. Attending the workshops, listening to the speakers and enjoying the entertainment will enlighten us all.

Stop by the K-State Union and don a rainbow-striped ribbon. And even though you might take it off at the end of the week, remember the ribbon's colorful message throughout the year.

Let this week's events have a positive influence on you, and in turn, you'll make a positive impact on the future.

Checks send Congress bouncing off walls

Whoa, Nellie. The yahoos on Capitol Hill are at it again, and this time, their financial ineptitude is shining like the moon.

Members of the House of Representatives voted overwhelmingly Thursday to shut down their own little banking scam.

It seems when the General Accounting Office found out about a congressional habit of bouncing checks at the House bank, many didn't want to touch the subject. But now that disclosures have proven many prominent House members, including Speaker Thomas Foley, to have been using rubber checkbooks, the House has called for an ethics committee investigation.

However, several members of the ethics panel will probably have to withdraw from the investigation because they, too, have written bad checks.

This incident proves the fiscal incompetence plaguing our nation's capital.

How can a group of more than 500 men and women balance the budget or control our growing national debt when they cannot even balance their personal checkbooks? Can we expect these elected officials to stop the savings and loan crisis when they have one of their own?

Representatives need to keep their own back yards neat before they attempt to clean the nation's junkyard of debt and banking fiascos, or they may not remain in Washington much longer.

The game of choice

College students everywhere both "love" and live itSTEFFANY CARREL

I was glancing through my cornflower-blue, week-at-a-glance, academic assignment calendar today. And what a glance it was.

What I saw made little shivers run through my kneecaps.

It made my eyebrows crinkle. It made my bellybutton itch.

It was grim indeed.

What upset me so?

Next week, to be precise.

For during those seven days, I will be entirely inundated with homework. From dawn til dusk, and then some. And then — even more.

But honestly, I can handle this next week from hell.

I mean, all I have to do is play "The Game," right?

You know what I mean.

I think I can safely say the majority of college students out there play it. You just don't remember the name.

Well, I'll take the liberty of refreshing your minds. It's called "Cramming Land." Also known as "Faking-It Land" and "I'll-Forget-Everything-I've-Memorized-Tomorrow Land."

The stores can't seem to keep it in stock.

Surely you recall the rules. They're simple, easy to read, and there's not much boring filler.

Let's see if I can remember them.

On assigned readings

Never read them for a lecture class of more than 50 students. In a class this big, the odds are very much against any pop quizzes. (This may vary from one instructor to the next, so one must be wary.)

For the most part, however, readings are a waste of time. Instead, the night before a test, read all class notes, the objectives at the beginning of the chapter and the review questions at the end of the chapter. If need be, one can skim through the text quickly to find any important answers.

With reference to one's smaller classes, sacrifices may have to be made. The material may actually have to be read. It is advised, in these instances, to use utmost discretion.

On Research Papers

Unfortunately, plagiarism is a serious offense. So, when copying your notes/paper from your secondary source, bring a thesaurus. This will make changing every word into the appropriate synonym much easier. And, of course, never start a research paper until two to three days before it is due.

On Studying For Tests

This rule essentially gave the game its title, "Cramming Land."

Never, absolutely never start studying for a test any sooner than the night before. In some instances, wait even as long as two hours before the test. When you finally get around to studying, begin by physically shoving information into your brain. Refer to the rules on assigned readings for any further instruction on test cramming.

These rules can be entirely disregarded if one is an architecture or engineering major. These people have rules about school and homework the rest of us would consider psychotic or insane.

Now, for the rest of you folks, what is really important is to get by with as little effort as possible.

Fake it. Schlep on through. Use that short-term memory to its fullest extent.

Seriously, all college really is anyway is dragging and plodding through the week to get to the blissful, mindless weekend, right?

We're not here to learn anything. We're not here to think creative thoughts.

It's not like we'll be running the country anytime soon.

We just have to be here. So, go ahead. Play "The Game."

It's quick. It's fun. And everybody's doing it.

RACISM

Sad reality of prejudice difficult to endJASON HAMILTON

I wanted to write something important this week to do my part for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. I wanted to write something that would change people.

It's at times like this, however, when I come face to face with the limitations of my own creativity and skill. Racism is ugly and evil, and I have trouble thinking of anything useful to say about it.

I can't delve deep into my own more controversial views on racism because they would expose the fact that I'm not even remotely politically correct.

I thought about trying to write a funny column so more people would actually read it. The trouble is, there isn't anything even remotely funny about racism.

My own experience with overt racism is rather limited. It consists of watching racist bikers harass some Pakistanis, then get violently expelled from Manhattan by the Skinheads Against Racism.

So, after thinking it over, I realized the only thing I could even hope to do would be to make people aware that racism is a problem — even here in a small, "nice" community.

The bizarre mix of fear and hate comprising racism exists at various levels in our society. There are the cowardly, yet vicious, racists who build their egos by ganging up on and physically attacking people who are different. These are folks like the KKK, which uses terrorism on fellow Americans.

Closer to home, there is the frat-thats-shall-remain-nameless which seems to think it's cool to go out and bash members of whichever minority they've chosen that year.

These are the racists who have always existed. Their racism springs from a fairly common source. If their own lives aren't going well, they find a group of different people and claim these people are inferior. When these inferior people turn out to be just as smart and talented as the racists (which isn't saying much), the hate-mongers cast about for a way to redeem their floundering self-image.

They find it in terrorism and violence. It's the same as bullies on playgrounds. They gang up on individuals of their target group and, in their own eyes, redeem their own pathetic existences.

These are the racists who make me so angry. I'm not a particularly violent person, and I'm definitely not a very big person. However, sometimes when I'm in a bad mood, if I were to bump into someone late at night whom I knew to be one of these racists, I think I might just keep swinging until I could no longer move.

This is the racism everyone hears and worries about. But it is only the violent end of a much deeper phenomenon.

The ultimate root of this overt, violent racism lies in a fact that will never change: whites, blacks, Asians and Hispanics all look different. No matter what the government does, no matter how many harmony walks are walked and no matter what I write, nothing will affect that.

It seems like a stupid and redundant point to make, but it is important. As long as there are groups of people who are so obviously different from others around them, they will be a target for the ugly hate-slashing of another group.

If Bill the Racist is looking for someone to hate, a group of people with a different background and differently colored skin will be a prime target. There is nothing that can be done. The only way racism will completely vanish is if it becomes inconceivable that there be any difference between people.

I'm not saying the government should just give up or we shouldn't all go on the Harmony Walk Friday afternoon — we all should. Things like this have to be done to keep discrimination and racial violence from getting worse.

But I don't see any way that racism will ever be eradicated unless we all were to suddenly turn lime green. And then, of course, we'd just find other old reasons to attack each other — like religion.

Columns like this always depress me, because not only do I have trouble articulating what I really feel, but also what I really feel is despair.

All I can do is hope our society grows up and stops attacking itself. But I won't hold my breath.

Yenkey said. "We're talking about the eight best riders from across the country — 18 and under. So it was still a pretty big honor and something I was proud of."

The Cycling Federation then sent the team to Casper, Wyo., to compete in a seven-day stage race in the professional category.

"It was the most incredible racing I've ever seen," Yenkey's mother said. She rode in the U.S.-team van for two of the races to watch her son.

Yenkey completed the last two stages with two 10th-place finishes, impressing his coaches enough to move him up from the alternate spot to one of the top six riders.

The Wyoming race wasn't the first time Yenkey had worn the Stars and Stripes in an international race. In May 1990, his team, the Spirits of St. Louis, was chosen to represent the United States at the Pan Am Games in Uruguay.

"It was such a fantastic feeling to put on the national team jersey because no matter where you go in the world, the American flag is recognized," he said.

But the good feeling did not last long. Yenkey got three flat tires during his race, and his team had a total of 11. Yenkey wasn't even able to finish the race.

"It was an incredibly disappointing day in my life," he said.

So at the World Championship race in Wyoming, he looked to improve on his Uruguay/Pan Am showing. No American rider had won the World Championship since three-time Tour De France-winner Greg LeMond won it.

So he remembers L.L. Cool J getting turned down, and he remembers the American team lining up at the starting line in the Garden of the Gods. Yenkey said the United States had people intimidated.

"Not only were we in our country," he said, "but we had a whole bunch of American fans yelling 'U.S.A.' It was also very possibly the most nervous I've ever been before a race after I looked around and started thinking, 'There are 45 countries here.'"

The race was 72 miles — nine laps on an eight-mile course — with each lap containing two steep climbs.

Yenkey said it was the most physically-demanding course he had ever ridden, especially the climbs.

"We're talking about the best 18-year-old riders in the world, and they were going at seven miles per hour," he said. "People would walk up the hill beside us yelling, 'You can go faster,' and you're saying, 'Why don't you try it?'"

The race also proved to be mentally difficult because everything that he had done, all the competing and training, all the things he missed out on over the last three years, had led up to this.

"Ultimately, this is what it's all for," he said of the race. "You just keep trying to go up the ladder of success and at the top of it is the world championships, so there was so much at stake that you were nervous about screwing up. Members of the national team just don't screw up. There was just a lot of pressure."

Yenkey didn't win a medal in the race. He was one of only 65 riders that finished, however. Even so, he was very disappointed with his performance.

"I just had a bad day, and that's all it took," Yenkey said. "If the race had been the day before or the day after it could have been a whole different story."

Weaver said she was absolutely heartsick for her son towards the end of the race.

"I thought 'What am I going to say when this is all over?'" she said.

Coach Schneider said he thought Yenkey could have done much better and seemed very nervous. But Schneider said he also feels Yenkey has the physical capabilities to compete at the professional level.

Yenkey said he is not sure about that. He said he does plan to participate in the Olympic trials-qualifying race next June in Pennsylvania. To make the Olympic team, Yenkey said he will probably have to win the race.

And Yenkey said he is pleased with what he has accomplished so far in his cycling career, even though he is still coming to terms with his performance in the World Championships.

"It was a real letdown for me," Yenkey said. "I hadn't lived up to expectations, and it was hard for me to accept."

But, for now, Yenkey sees himself staying in school as other members of the national team are bypassing school to turn professional.

"I really haven't decided if I will turn pro," Yenkey said. "There are a lot of things I want to do with my life, and not all of them pertain to cycling. I think there is more to life than riding a bike."

ALCS: Speed vs. everything else

Toronto hopes top of order provides spark

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Devon White, the Toronto Blue Jays' game-breaking No. 1 batter, is leading off the AL playoffs with a trend-breaking prediction.

"While most combatants are predicting a long, low-scoring series between two evenly matched teams, the man his teammates call 'Devo' is singing another song.

"I don't know if it's going to go the distance, to tell you the truth," he said. "I think we'll take it before that — maybe five games. We'll be satisfied if we get away with one in here because we're pretty tough at home."

The best-of-seven series between the Blue Jays and the AL West champion Minnesota Twins starts today at the Metrodome.

Observers generally agree the Twins have advantages in hitting, power, starting pitching and defense. And they have the home-field advantage.

"What they don't have that we have is speed," said Roberto Alomar, the Blue Jays' No. 2 batter. "That's how we're going to beat them. If me and Devo get on base, I like our chances a lot."

White and Alomar have set the table all season for No. 3 hitter Joe Carter, who had 108 RBIs.

White batted .282 with 40 doubles, 10 triples, 110 runs and 33 steals in 43 attempts. He also had 17 homers and 60 RBIs.

Alomar batted .295 with 41 doubles, 11 triples, 69 RBIs, 88 runs and 53 steals in 64 attempts. Only Rickey Henderson stole more bases in the AL.

Dan Gladden, Minnesota's leadoff man, batted .247 with 14 doubles, nine triples, 64 runs and a career-low 15 stolen bases.

Chuck Knoblauch is the top Rookie of the Year candidate. He filled huge voids at second base and in the No. 2 spot in the order. He batted .281 with 24 doubles, six triples, 78 runs and 25 steals in 30 attempts.

Gladden finished the season in a .184 slump over his last 39 games. Manager Tom Kelly even tried several other leadoff hitters and moved Gladden down in the order.

"Danny has done a pretty good job all season," Kelly said. "He's had some ups and downs, just like other players. Right now, he's not swinging as good as he can, but it's not for lack of effort. As long as he's doing the best he can, that's good enough for me."

The domed series

The Minnesota Twins and the Toronto Blue Jays begin the first-ever all-domed series tonight in Minneapolis for the American League pennant. Here is the ALCS schedule and starting pitchers.

Today
Toronto (Candiotti 13-13) at Minnesota (Morris 18-12), 7:39 p.m.

Wednesday, Oct. 9
Toronto (Guzman 10-3) at Minnesota (Tapani 16-9), 2:07 p.m.
Friday, Oct. 11
Minnesota (Erickson 20-8) at Toronto (Key 16-12) 7:37 p.m.
Saturday, Oct. 12
Minnesota at Toronto, 3:12 p.m.
Sunday, Oct. 13
*Minnesota at Toronto, 3:12 p.m.
Tuesday, Oct. 15
*Toronto at Minnesota, 7:37 p.m.
Wednesday, Oct. 16
*Toronto at Minnesota, 7:37 p.m.
* if necessary

Gladden was good enough for the Twins in 1987, when he was one of their most effective postseason players. He batted .350 with five RBIs in the playoffs and .290 with a homer, seven RBIs and two steals in the World Series. He batted safely in all seven Series games and rose the roof with a Game 1 grand slam that set the event's tone.

"He's definitely a gamer," Knoblauch said. "I don't see him putting pressure on himself."

"It's nice to have speed. You can't beat speed," Toronto manager Cito Gaston said. "The reason we give a guy the green light ... is because these guys know how to run the bases. They know when to go."

Brian Harper, who will catch Jack Morris on Tuesday and Kevin Tapani on Wednesday (Junior Ortiz catches Scott Erickson), has thrown out only 22 of the 121 baserunners who have attempted to steal against him.

"I'm not saying I'm Johnny Bench or anything, but the percentage of throwing runners out can be misleading," Harper said. "Our pitchers are very good pitchers, but I think they'd be the first to admit that their strength is not holding runners on."

Chiefs' big-play defense crushes Buffalo

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Kansas City's defense gave Buffalo's no-huddle offense no hope.

The Bills, averaging more than 32 points and 450 yards in winning their first five games in defense of their AFC championship, suffered six quarterback sacks, five lost fumbles and their most lopsided defeat in four years Monday night as the Chiefs romped to a 33-6 victory.

Christian Okoye, following two Buffalo turnovers, scored two touchdowns two minutes apart as the Chiefs took complete control in the third quarter.

The Bills, who haven't been held without a TD since Dec. 4, 1988, suffered their worst defeat since a 47-6 loss to Indianapolis by replacement players during the 1987 strike. Derrick Thomas had four of the Chiefs' sacks, with two of them causing fumbles.

Okoye ran for 130 yards, setting a Chiefs record with his 13th 100-yard game, and rookie Harvey Williams rushed for 103.

The Bills, held to 210 total yards, still were in the game when Thurman Thomas took a pass from Jim Kelly deep in Buffalo territory and was immediately hit by Lonnie Marts, who knocked the ball loose for Kevin Ross to scoop up and run 13 yards to the Buffalo 17.

Steve DeBerg hit Robb Thomas for 12 yards to the five, then Okoye went over on the next play for a 23-6 lead with 2:52 left in the third quarter. A moment later, Thomas sacked Kelly, knocking the ball loose, and Dan Saleaumua recovered on the 11. On fourth and goal from the two, Okoye knocked a defender backward into the end zone.

A fumble by Don Beebe on the ensuing kickoff led to Nick Lowery's 22-yard field goal. Lowery also kicked a 41-yarder in the first quarter, a 40-yarder in the second and a 24-yarder in the third.

Thomas, the Bills' leading rusher, left the game late in the quarter with an apparent ankle injury.

Adding to their miseries, even the officiating went against the Bills. Officials placed the ball five yards away from where they should have after replay officials overturned a Buffalo pass completion in the third period.

DeBerg, after faking to Okoye, hit Pete Holohan with a one-yard touchdown pass on the second play of the second quarter.

The Chiefs sacked Kelly four times in the first half and harassed him on almost every passing down.

Buffalo got a 44-yard field goal in the second quarter from Scott Norwood and then a 25-yarder after wasting a first down on the Chiefs 11 after Okoye fumbled into the arms of Buffalo's Leonard Smith on the Chiefs 34.

A roughing-the-passer call against Bill Maas two plays later moved the Bills' 11 yards to the 11, but the Chiefs' defense, which came into the game allowing an AFC-low 12 points per game, refused to yield. On second and three from the four, Maas recorded the Chiefs' third sack, downing Kelly on the 12.

Intrasquad games highlight schedule for baseball team

Clark, players watch the clock under new rules

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

Monday was Mike Clark's birthday. He had tickets to the Chiefs-Bills football game.

But in a season of change, personal entertainment took a back seat to fall baseball practice, as Clark directed separate workouts for returning players and walk-ons.

"We're the only team in the region to be starting this late," said Clark, who will run practices through Nov. 11. "I'm hoping the short layover from fall to spring will help us."

Clark was forced to alter workout schedules when new NCAA regulations went into effect Aug. 1. The Wildcats will not play a fall schedule against junior colleges as they have done in the past, and practice time has been limited to 20 hours per week.

"Each player signs a sheet with their practice time," Clark said. "It's kind of like a job, punching the time card when you get in and when you leave. If that's what we've got to do, we'll make the best of it."

Returnees started Sunday, with position players rotating through various offensive stations. Pitchers spent time loosening their arms and conditioning.

The short evaluation period has already allowed Clark to weigh strengths and weaknesses.

"I think pitchingwise, it's a staff that will have to throw strikes to be effective," Clark said. "We don't have anyone that is overpowering. There's more freshmen and sophomores than juniors and seniors, so some things will have to come together. "If it does come together, we're going to have a lot of fun."

That's because Clark has a strong nucleus returning in the field. Despite the loss of four players to the professional draft and free-agent signings, K-State will return five regulars, led by senior shortstop Craig Wilson.

"We've got enough people around who know how to get a drill started when we tell them what to do," Clark said. "We're going to get a lot of things done because of that."

One thing K-State will increase during fall workouts is the number of intrasquad scrimmages. Clark said it will be the best way to evaluate individual talent in a short period of time.

"The caliber of our games will probably be better than it would against some of the junior colleges we normally play," Clark said. "The only problem with that is after you do it for so long, it's hard to stay concentrated. It's tough to get up for somebody you know everything that they're going to do."

Clark conducted walk-out tryouts for approximately 50 players Monday night at Frank Myers Field, and said there would be six more sessions for non-scholarship players in the next two weeks.

"We won't be able to keep as many as we have in the past," Clark said. "We will still have a junior varsity team, but instead of 17 or 18 players, we will probably only suit up 12 or 13."

In addition to a limited schedule, Clark's number of assistant coaches was reduced from two to one in the off season. Clark and Phil Morgan are directing both the varsity and junior varsity teams.

"It's been a hassle, and will be a hassle, but it's something we have to do," Clark said. "I coach to be out on the field with the players, and I will continue to enjoy that."

K-State's first intrasquad scrimmage is scheduled for 3 p.m., Thursday at Frank Myers Field.

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

Jacquie Wright, Sarahayn Morehead, Debbie Chrystal, Robin Lewis and Donita Gleason are all newcomers to the K-State women's golf squad this season. Morehead transferred from Wichita State last season.

Newcomers provide missing pieces to puzzle

Class of recruits here for different reasons

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

When chatting with Mark Elliott about this year's women's golf team, it's not difficult to notice a twinkle in his eye.

One glance through the files of his new recruits, and it doesn't take long to understand his excitement.

After signing one of the top recruiting classes in the history of K-State golf, Elliott has a tournament trophy on his shelf after just three meets.

Much to Elliott's delight, there are five new women sporting Wildcat golf bags this fall. They are freshmen Debbie Chrystal, Donita Gleason, Robin Lewis and Jacquie Wright, and sophomore transfer Sarahayn Morehead.

The five newcomers complement a solid base of five returning players to give the Cats a squad of 10, nearly doubling squads from previous seasons.

In fact, considering numbers alone, this year's class was equal to the past three seasons combined. Last year the squad inked Denise Pottle, who was the team's number five player last season. The season before that, then-K-State coach Russ Bunker signed Valerie Hahn, who went on to earn Big Eight player of the month last March. Three years ago, the recruits were Adena Hagedorn and Theresa Coyle, the club's two seniors.

The lasting quality of this bunch has not been determined, but they are already making a mark on the program. In the three tournaments to date, the new class has been represented at each meet.

"They're all pretty good players that we recruited," graduate assistant coach Len Johnsen said. "It pushes all the players and increases the competition, which is something different over what has gone on here in the past. It shows all of Mark's hard work recruiting last year."

All of the players were attracted by the team's improving attitude and the dedicated coaching staff as well as the friendly nature of the campus and the quality of the academic programs.

"I liked the architecture program and the golf program and the coach," said Wright, a native of DeSoto, Mo. "I saw K-State getting better, and once I started looking at schools, I started really following and noticing (K-State's) improvement."

"I don't think I would have come down here if it weren't for the golf team," Lewis said. "Being on a team, I feel like I have a place. They have a strong and well-known dietetics program and that helped make my decision easier."

Gleason said that just getting to this level fulfilled a big aspiration. "To be able to attend a Big Eight school on a golf scholarship was just the thrill of my life," Gleason said.

Chrystal, an all-region performer from Belleville, Texas, echoed that thought, saying she really hadn't told anyone of her desire to play on the collegiate level, but that she considered it a real accomplishment.

Lewis, from Huron, S.D., said that Elliott has been a big help with her game and that the friendly atmosphere has helped her adjustment.

"Everyone was real nice," Lewis said, who finished in the top 10 in state high school meets three times. "I got some help from coach and started playing well."

The dedication of Elliott helped persuade Gleason to sign.

"When Mark recruited me, he talked about the girls that he was recruiting and I knew them and was very impressed with his choices," Gleason said.

Morehead, who transferred from Wichita State, said there were several things that she liked about K-State compared to her former school.

"It's more constructive here and the team is close," Morehead said. "Everyone is willing to help each other and they really make me feel like I fit in."

"I wanted to come to the program and see if I could succeed here. So far, I'm doing better here than at WSU."

Morehead and Chrystal are the only two out of the group who have yet to qualify for a tournament. But both came within strokes of making the last meet.

Chrystal, who has only played golf for two years, said that the move to the collegiate level is a challenging one.

"The whole thing is an adjustment," Chrystal said. "College is an adjustment, being away from home and having a roommate. It's not just golf, it's everything."

2nd language aids job hunt

Business, travel opportunities promote bilingual study

MISSY GUSTIN
Collegian Reporter

A study released last week indicates there is a remarkable increase in the number of college students studying foreign languages.

The Modern Language Association conducted the study from different colleges around the world.

Bradley Shaw, head of the Department of Modern Languages, said the trend for taking modern languages has definitely increased nationally, regionally and locally.

"There is an increase in student body around the world, but we are finding that the trend is growing beyond normal expectations," Shaw said.

The trend is also occurring at K-State. In 1988, the modern languages department had eight sections of Spanish I. It now has 15.

"We really can't fully access how we relate to the study due to cutbacks in the budgets," Shaw said.

Shaw said more students becoming aware of opportunities for business and travel through modern language could be one factor contributing to the trend.

Shelly Goddard, senior in criminal justice, said she thinks her ability to speak Spanish will help her find a job in the future.

"When I establish my career, I hope it will allow me to excel just that much more," Goddard said.

According to the study, the major language growth areas are Spanish, Japanese and Russian.

Shaw said the University is planning to teach Japanese next year, clearly an economic issue in engineering and business.

Shaw said K-State has made conscious efforts in responding to the expressed needs of students to develop conversational skills in language. The University has also altered the curriculum for more opportunities in speaking and listening skills.

"We are known to have good instructors. The staff is positioned well to be interested in the beginning learner as well as the advanced learner," Shaw said. "My belief is that modern language is no longer a luxury, but a necessity for educated people."

Much of the scandal surrounds a strategy known as direct placement, in which the pension fund's money bought securities that weren't traded publicly, making their value hard to assess.

The strategy also funneled KPERS money into risky investments, ranging from start-up companies to debt-financed corporate takeovers.

As the value of these holdings deteriorated, the investment managers — evidently operating with a free hand — set the reported value of investments on which their own fees were based.

When the KPERS board first allowed direct placement in 1976, the strategy was limited to investments in companies influencing the Kansas economy, and each company had to meet several criteria of financial soundness. But in ensuing years, these restrictions were relaxed.

Last month, the special prosecutor filed the first criminal complaint in the scandal, against one of the KPERS investment management firms, Reimer and Koger Associates of Merriam. The complaint alleged seven counts of securities fraud in handling a $50-million loan to a thrift that later failed.

The company has denied wrongdoing.

"It's sad for the people of Kansas that the Salem witch trials have begun," firm owner Kenneth Koger said.

Two other money management firms also handled KPERS investments and now are under investigation: Peters, Gamm, West and Vincent Inc., Wichita, and J.W. O'Connor Inc., New York.

Since 1985, state investigators say, the two Kansas-based money management firms companies have invested $528 million for KPERS in direct placements.

Medical teams train for months

Preparedness key to responding within minutes

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

Riley County's emergency medical service emphasizes preparedness. Director Larry Couchman said EMS employees must be certified through participation in an extensive training program that lasts four to six months.

The ambulance center provides service for both Memorial and the Saint Mary hospitals. The center has a paid staff of 16 full-time and 20 part-time individuals.

Six employees work each shift — five at the station and one on call. The station is equipped with four ambulances, an all-terrain vehicle and a boat for water rescues.

Emergency calls are received at the Riley County Police Department. Based on the type of emergency, the call is dispatched by the push of a button to the appropriate emergency response team.

"The amount of traffic can determine how much time it actually takes to get to a desired location," Couchman said.

"It usually takes three to six minutes in the city and approximately 15 minutes to surrounding communities such as Randolph.

"We also have a first-responder group, which consists of a volunteer in surrounding small towns. This person is able to start any basic initial care before the ambulance unit arrives."

Paramedic Supervisor Michelle Saber said Memorial Hospital and the Riley County Commission establish fees for the ambulance service.

The base emergency fee is $260, not including mileage and disposable supplies. The non-emergency base fee is $150.

Saber said with the advanced life support service offered, the quality of care is excellent.

"We have 2,600 to 2,700 patient contacts a year," Couchman said. "These contacts range from routine standbys at football games to serious medical conditions."

Assistant RCPD Director Larry Woodyard said the department was pleased with the service provided to Riley County and the surrounding area.

"Every staff person is quite well trained," Woodyard said. "The police department has an excellent working relationship with the EMS."

Couchman said, "It's very challenging and hard, but that's why we're here."

Marijuana

make tons of money."

Bentivenga said if the drug was legalized, there would be a need for an agency to keep it from being sold on the black market.

"Although people say that legalizing marijuana would make it less of a forbidden fruit of sorts," she said, "people use drugs for the high that it gives them and for the pleasure they get. Whether or not it's legal makes no difference to them."

Opponents of legalization also say marijuana is a gateway drug that leads to the use of other drugs. Greg Copeland, sophomore in political science and potential member of the local NORML chapter, said this is not necessarily true.

"When people refer to marijuana as a gateway drug, they mean an illegal drug," he said. "The real gateway drug is alcohol because that's the first drug people try."

There is no real difference between alcohol and other drugs, he said.

At one time, the use of marijuana was not restricted by law.

It was first made illegal in the United States in the 1930s. In the 1970s, 10 states decriminalized possession in small amounts. Bills for nationwide decriminalization were considered by Congress about the same time, but none passed.

"Society is on a conservative swing. There's a slim chance that it will be decriminalized or made legal today," said Dr. Larry Peak, the director of a private mental health practice at the Manhattan Medical Center.

Legalization opponents said the war against drugs has been both far reaching and effective.

They said the large number of education and prevention programs will hurt the chance of the drug being legalized. "Everyone, not just the older generations, recognizes the hazards of using drugs and the health problems drugs can cause. Television programs and advertisements have been very effective in that area," Conkwright said.

Peak suggested an alternative solution to the drug problem.

Employers want workers not to use drugs, he said, so employers should test their employees.

"Employers socially responsible for other's lives, such as those in transportation and health, should give their employees drug tests. People will stop so as not to risk losing or not obtaining a job."

Bentivenga said he agrees. "People who decide to use drugs don't live in a vacuum. Their decisions affect their friends, family, co-workers and everyone around them."

Advocates of legalization and decriminalization say mandatory drug testing and the making of all marijuana use illegal violates personal rights.

Decriminalization advocates don't want to see people's lives thrown away because they were caught possessing marijuana once, the student said.

On the environmental side of the argument, advocates say legalization would decrease dependence on fossil fuels because many of those products could be produced from marijuana. The plant yields more cellulose per acre than trees and grows faster. This would slow depletion of rain forests, they say.

The drug may also have medical uses. Though research has been hampered by the drug's illegal status, it could benefit cancer, glaucoma and multiple sclerosis patients.

The seed of the plant, which is not psychoactive, also contains an amount of protein second only to soybeans.

GREAT MEMORIES START HERE

Right here. With the Royal Purple. Who else covers all the events, organizations, housing, academics and student life in one exciting, stimulating and award-winning book? Just think of all the football and basketball games, homecoming, club and housing activities, events and issues you will miss if you don't order your 1992 Royal Purple. Follow these three simple steps to ensure happiness and great memories even after your college experience.

1. First, look below to find out when you are scheduled to have your housing portrait taken, and go to Room 209 in the K-State Union. If you have not gone yet -- you had better hurry up! If you missed your scheduled time, you can go anytime, just make sure you specify what living group you belong to.

2. Second, go to club meetings to find out when they are having their organization picture taken and go!

3. Finally, in order to ensure you have proof you completed steps 1 and 2, purchase your copy of the 1992 Royal Purple. Go to Kedzie Hall 103, the Student Publications office, with $16 to purchase your yearbook. But you had better hurry before prices go up!

Straining to pull himself along a rope, Chris Buchanan, sophomore in business administration, participates in Warrior Assault Course. The course consisted of training exercises Saturday at Fort Riley.

ROTC cadets fight simulated enemy

Five men and women in camouflage lay prone, hidden by the tall grass around them. Their dusty faces were streaked with black, green and tan greasepaint. One at a time, they ran toward the enemy bunker with their weapons slung on their backs commando style. Gunfire was coming from the left and up ahead, and their goal was to get close enough to the bunker to spray it with grenades. But the bullets fired were blanks, and the enemy bunker was empty.

"You're up, you're seen, you're down!" ROTC Cadet Capt. Mike Tomlinson shouted. "You're up too long! You're dead!"

It was the last obstacle Saturday in the Warrior Assault Course at Fort Riley, and the men and women rushing the bunker comprised third squad, third platoon of the K-State ROTC Wildcat Battalion.

Tomlinson, senior in industrial engineering, continued to bark out commands as he explained that although the gunfire and the enemy were simulated, what the assault course prepared the cadets for was real — combat. And third squad had done well. They completed the assault course in 20:19.

"That's a good time. It was the upper-body strength crossing the ropes that put them ahead," Tomlinson said.

It was now 1530 (3:30 p.m.) and the warriors might have been tired, but they didn't show it. The day had begun at 0500 (5 a.m.) with a hot breakfast — hot being about the only good thing about it. Scrambled eggs tend to look greenish when they are served out in the field, cadets agreed, but nobody really knows why.

After a short break during which the cadets got to rehydrate with lemon drops and a canteen of water, Cadet Capt. Stephen Holdeman was ready to brief the cadets for the obstacle course.

"Ground your weapons and your LBE — 15 seconds!" he shouted. None of the cadets knew what

Thomas requests delay to clear name

Confirmation vote put on hold while harassment allegations investigated

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Senate postponed its vote Tuesday on Clarence Thomas' Supreme Court nomination for one week to investigate sexual harassment allegations. Thomas "totally and unequivocally" denied the accusation.

The embattled nominee requested a delay to "clear my name" as several crucial Democratic supporters said they could not vote for him until the allegations were aired.

Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell said the allegations should be "publicly and fairly resolved."

Anita Hill, a University of Oklahoma law professor who says Thomas made repeated lewd remarks to her when she worked for him a decade ago, said she would cooperate with the Senate.

"I intend to go to Washington if it is requested," she said.

Thomas appeared a sure bet for confirmation until Hill's allegations became public over the weekend. Since then, several Thomas opponents have urged new committee hearings to investigate Hill's allegations.

Thomas supporters had initially fought a delay, but relented when it became clear there might be enough support for confirmation if

Man at student's funeral identified

PAT OBLEY
City/Government Editor

The unknown man who was wanted for questioning by the Geary County Sheriff's department regarding his appearance at a K-State student's funeral turned himself in Monday.

Catherine A. Heintze, sophomore in arts and sciences, was found dead of a gunshot wound to the head at a convenience store near Junction City where she was working Sept. 20.

As a routine part of the homicide investigation, the funeral was videotaped. When the tape was reviewed, an unknown man was seen coming out of the church, prompting authorities to release the tape to the media in an effort to discover the man's identity.

Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said the man is 29 years old and is from Manhattan, but would not release his name.

Deppish also said at this time, the man does not appear to be a suspect.

The man was encouraged to turn himself in by his wife and brother after reading a story that appeared in the Oct. 2 Collegian.

According to Deppish, the man had not known Heintze for very long. "He said that he met her two days before she was killed," Deppish said. "They had met briefly in the K-State Student Union."

Deppish said the brief encounter at the Union was the man's reason for going to the funeral.

Donna Heintze, Catherine's mother, said she had no idea who the man was.

"Catherine hadn't said anything about meeting him," she said. "I don't know why he was at the funeral."

Deppish called this latest development a "relief" and said other leads can now be pursued.

"Finding this guy has been very, very important to us," Deppish said.

Farrell Library receives gift of $2 million

Anonymous donors give to Essential Edge

BECKY SCHROEDER
Collegian Reporter

Anonymous donors have committed $2 million to Farrell Library as part of the Essential Edge's University libraries project.

Manhattan residents Richard and Marjorie Morse, co-chairpersons of the University libraries project, announced the gift Tuesday, and Bill Manning, KSU Foundation constituent development officer, announced the gift to Student Senate at its meeting Tuesday night.

"The Foundation staff, University officials and a host of volunteer leaders have aggressively sought a lead gift to the Essential Edge campaign to benefit Farrell Library," Richard Morse said. "The donors' commitment is in direct response to a challenge issued by the K-State students."

The challenge by students is to execute a $27-million addition and re-

Senate also overturned Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt's veto of funding for a religious group's guest speaker and approved about $22,000 to purchase Student Government office furniture.

Debate regarding the referendum took almost three hours.

Union Station gets the blues

Lemuel Sheppard lets his music do the talking for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week

CRAIG KREUTZER
Collegian Reporter

Lemuel Sheppard brought his blues to K-State Tuesday as part of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

RACIAL/ETHNIC HARMONY WEEK

The nationally known bluesman, music educator and composer discussed blues music and its origins in a workshop titled "African-American Music and Literature" for a group of about 50 people in Union Station. Sheppard is a Pittsburg resident.

With his acoustic guitar, Sheppard gave the audience a sample of the blues.

"I do a lot more singing and playing than talking," he said in his opening statement.

Sheppard played blues songs from a number of different styles.

One style was the juba.

The juba originated with slaves, he said. A juba-style blues song has a melody that remains the same while the lyrics changed, and the lyrics are made up as the song goes along. "All you needed was a person playing a banjo and a person who had the gift to improvise," he said.

While there are many different styles of blues, he said, the blues message has remained the same from generation to generation.

"One reason blues has been around is because it is something that has been handed down."

One thing handed down from generation to generation are the lyrics.

Though the melodies may have changed, Sheppard said, many words have remained the same. He also said it wasn't the melody that was important but the feeling of the song.

"What was handed down was how deep, how bad the feelings really were," Sheppard said. "This is really the most important part of understanding the blues."

"Whenever you listen to blues or any black music, try to extract what they're handing down."

Sheppard said the reason the style of music is called blues is because it sounds as if the musician is depressed or "blue."

REGIONOff-road trek turns up Indian skull

WICHITA (AP) — A skull found by a teen-ager during the weekend is that of an American Indian woman, according to Sedgwick County Sheriff Mike Hill.

A 16-year-old driving an all-terrain vehicle along the Arkansas River near Mulvane on Sunday found the skull, Hill said. An anthropologist at Wichita State University said the woman, who died decades ago, was between 30 and 40 years old.

The skull was turned over to the Kansas Historical Society for burial, Hill said.

NATIONCBS knows gridiron show no go for Bo

MINNEAPOLIS (AP) — CBS Sports reported Tuesday that doctors will recommend that Bo Jackson not play football again. But Jackson's agent called the report a lie and said the two-sport star is due to report to the Los Angeles Raiders.

Pat O'Brien read the report on CBS' pregame show before Game 1 of the American League playoffs.

"Bad news for Bo Jackson and Bo Jackson fans, which is all of us, really," O'Brien said. "CBS Sports has learned that medical authorities in Los Angeles are about to recommend to Bo that he should not play football again. This, after medical tests just yesterday revealed the cartilage in his injured hip has not regenerated and, in fact, has gotten worse. Efforts to reach Bo today have failed."

Richard Woods, Jackson's agent, denied the report from his home in Birmingham, Ala.

"It's false. Anything CBS said is a total lie," Woods said. "Pat O'Brien, as usual, is totally off the mark. Nothing has been decided. He's due to report next week."

Jackson injured his right hip in an NFL playoff game last Jan. 13 and didn't play baseball with the Chicago White Sox until the final month of the season. He hit .225 with three homers and 14 RBIs in 71 at-bats.

"If it were up to me, then I'd play football," Jackson said two weeks ago, "but I won't do anything until I talk with my doctors."

White Sox physician James Boscardin said he doubted Jackson would play for the Raiders this year. "At this point in his recovery, I think he probably is not going to be able to play football," Boscardin said, "but that's not our decision."

Jackson was released by the Kansas City Royals in March amid reports he would not play either sport because of the injury.

Employees join United Way effort

Every department to take part in campus campaign

By the Collegian Staff

K-State employees are being asked to support the United Way this month.

The campus campaign, which runs through Oct. 25, kicked off Tuesday morning with a breakfast for 180 campaign associates.

Every University department is represented by a least one associate, said Pete Cooper, professor of civil engineering and volunteer co-chairman of K-State's United Way coordinating committee.

Cooper said the associates distribute envelopes to everyone in their departments.

Each envelope contains a United Way brochure, a pledge card and a letter from President Jon Wefald. Cooper said associates are asked to distribute them in person.

"We would like the associates to have personal contact rather than put it in their mailboxes," he said.

In his department, Cooper said he asks everyone to at least return the envelope, even if they choose not to donate.

"We have two major objectives for the campus campaign," he said. "One is that we attempt to ensure that every employee has the opportunity to participate."

The second objective is to broaden the percentage of people who participate. Last year, less than 25 percent of the University work force contributed to the drive.

The University campaign is one of four components of the Manhattan-area campaign.

The K-State community contributed about 22 percent of the Manhattan-area drive last year, Cooper said.

Tom Hawk, a member of the Manhattan American Red Cross board of directors, said the United Way campaign is a more efficient way of raising money.

"The bottom line is we have more time and energy and money to devote to the people who need it," Hawk said.

Cooper said the campus campaign focuses mostly on employees because there is no organized student drive.

Students attending the first basketball practice, however, contribute when they pay admission. Half of the event's proceeds go to United Way. The other half benefits Farrell Library.

Accounting fraternity Alpha Kappa Psi, Circle K International and the Arnold Air Society also help the United Way campaign.

Thomas Schellhardt, first vice-chairman of the K-State's United Way coordinating committee, said there are 180 K-State United Way volunteers.

Collegian Reporters Donna Hedke, Jill Kippes and Erin Perry contributed to this report.

Students' fate is to graduate late

New options, changes in major add to length of education

By the Collegian Staff

Most students don't know what awaits them out in the "real world," but the real world will just have to wait for some of them.

More students are taking five or six years to graduate today as opposed to the traditional four-year educations of a decade ago.

"In the average freshman class, just 20 percent will have graduated at the end of four years," said Mike Lynch, assistant vice president for educational and personal development programs. "Forty percent will graduate in five or six years, and another 40 percent will drop out or transfer to another college."

"Part of this is because the students today have a new attitude about the options that are open to them."

One of these attitudes is a strong desire to search until one finds the right major, he said. It is not uncommon for a student to change majors two or three times before they find the right one.

Other students decide on majors late in their college careers.

Neil Miller, senior in psychology, had an idea of what he wanted to study, but he decided only recently what his plan would be.

"I decided late in my junior year that I wanted to get a dual degree in social work and psychology," Miller said. "Later, I realized it would be better to just graduate in psychology, and go to grad school in social work."

Choice isn't always a factor when it comes to changing majors. Sometimes students are forced to change because of the rising grade point average requirements in certain majors.

Registrar Don Foster said many departments are raising their standards.

Last year, the College of Business Administration required a minimum GPA of 2.25 for students to advance to upper-level classes. Now, the required GPA is 2.5.

College deans and department heads aren't the only ones stressing excellence.

Students are also becoming increasingly competitive. Some are taking more hours than they need to graduate so they will be more marketable when they look for a job.

For example, a student in education may choose to take more computer classes even though they are not required. In today's increasingly computer-reliant society, this could be the deciding factor when it comes to being chosen over another candidate for a job.

Another reason students are postponing graduation is because many need to work while going to school. Lynch said students are starting to

The label for blues music originated in Mississippi.

"When people heard how the voice sounded, they perceived that the person singing was sad," he said. Sheppard said some blues musicians compete to see whose troubles are the worst.

"They say, 'You think that's bad? Well, then, listen to this one,'" he said. "They try to show that, 'My blues are bluer than your blues.'"

Sheppard said this is what sometimes injects humor in the blues.

"A lot of blues music is down-trodden and depressing, but the words are humorous. The sentiment of blues is that you want to make light of a heavy situation," he said.

Sheppard applied this point by em-playing the audience in writing a song.

Audience members helped him compose blues songs about studying and stress. Sheppard had members of the audience suggest lines for the song, and he would then sing the lyrics to a basic blues line.

Sheppard ended the workshop by performing a humorous blues song he wrote. "Stereo" described the importance of owning a stereo when he was growing up.

Harriet Ottenheimer, professor of anthropology, helped bring Sheppard to K-State. He visited her class, "African-American Music and Culture," later in the day.

"Sheppard does research in an area that I am interested in."

MHA Handling of situation resembles "Grinch" tactics

It seems terrible the powers that be have to be so cold when it comes to the death of a young boy.

When the Manhattan Housing Authority overturned its inhumane decision to keep leukemia-stricken James Owens apart from a dog he had requested as his dying wish, we cheered.

But in the game of bureaucracy, one bad action leads to another.

The MHA allowed Milo the dog in the low-income housing complex on certain strict and ridiculous conditions.

James' mother had to furnish proof that her son had less than a month to live — the proverbial note-from-the-doctor routine. She also had to agree that Milo would be removed from the premises within 14 days of James' death.

This kind of callous treatment in such heart-wrenching situations can breach people's spirits and render their lives empty voids.

It would seem the MHA and other organizations like it would be in the business of life improvement rather than its bureaucratic destruction.

Jai Atkinson, MHA director, is to blame for this fiasco. She should be ashamed for the pain she has caused. Merely reversing her decision was not enough to heal the wounds inflicted on the Owens family.

To Atkinson and the MHA, get a life. Get a life so you can have the compassion to help others save theirs.

States don't want to drive 55

Kansas is one of 15 states defying a federal order to change some highways back to a 55-mph speed limit. The states are in the right — the federal order is out of line.

In 1988, the federal government allowed states to raise the speed limit to 65 mph on all interstate highways and selected state highways. The non-interstate highways would remain at 65 until Sept. 30 of this year as part of an "experiment."

Though Congress is expected to approve a bill to reauthorize the 65-mph program this month, the states were told last week to return the 2,304 miles of non-interstate highways back to 55 or face losing federal highway funding.

The whole point of the experiment was to determine if the 65-mph limit is beneficial for states and motorists. But after two years, the results are nil. State departments of transportation — Kansas' included — are befuddled.

Besides the expense and inconvenience states will incur switching all the signs back to read "55," motorists will no doubt wonder what the heck is going on.

And to make matters worse, no one knows if the change will be temporary or permanent.

The experiment idea was sound in theory, but this confusion is ridiculous. It would have made more sense to make the decision at or before the deadline and avoid the lapse.

State DOT officials say the order is ridiculous, and since they already have approval for the next couple of months of highway projects, it's not crunch time yet. They are going to wait it out until Congress makes a decision. But they shouldn't have to defy a federal order to do so.

Good job, states, for standing up to an inefficient and unfair order in the face of threats to take away precious funding.

Connect the dots & draw your life

ERIC BECKER

As children, we did dot-to-dot puzzles.

There was always a creative satisfaction in completing a dot-to-dot and drawing the lines between the printed dots.

Despite what might be seen as the predetermined outcome of the picture, the action of moving the pencil on the page gave us some control over the picture. The dots facilitated the creation, but our participation helped shape the outcome.

Much of what we do is like a dot-to-dot puzzle. The dots are already down for the most part, but it is up to us to draw the lines between them to complete the picture.

College coursework lends itself to this comparison. Each class is a dot in the scheme of the larger picture of our academic careers. Each dot is a goal, its own end, yet a starting place as well — a place from which we embark upon our next academic adventure.

To some extent, we choose the puzzle on which we work. There are limitations, but we choose the classes we take. The pattern from which we construct our puzzles offers a great deal of diversity.

And, of course, it's always up to the individual to draw the lines connecting the dots of his or her particular puzzle.

It's a simple comparison drawn from the shared experience of childhood, which everyone can claim. But it is not always such a simple matter.

For some people, the dots seem to move around on the page, forming constellations altogether different from the ones with which they thought they were working. It's not uncommon. Perceptions change, and when they do, we simply take up the pencil again to connect new dots that have appeared or those that remain of the old.

When it happens — when the picture changes before we complete it — we change our major, changing our coursework completely to accommodate the new pattern.

We seldom see the entire picture before it's complete. This, too, can cause confusion. What, an English major may wonder, does biology have to do with being an English teacher? Others may not understand how a class in English can apply to a course load in mathematics.

The big picture is sometimes hard to see. Sometimes we are lost in it and struggling between the dots with such effort we lose track of the place we're ultimately headed.

But even while lost in it, people must sometimes trust the dots to lead them to the end for which they strive.

The dots are important, but it's the spaces between them that make up the real distance of our respective journeys — academic or otherwise.

They (the dots, our classes) are the stepping stones which guide us and support us while we travel. Each one is a step toward the whole, complete and healthy person each of us strives to be in our lives.

And once your puzzle is complete, whose face do you suppose will stare up at you from the page?

Bush neglecting environment

Editor,

I am writing in response to John Wartenberger, who, in an Oct. 3 letter, seemed to be concerned that Ted Heisel dared to doubt "this country's esteemed President Bush" has paid anything but lip service to the environment.

I would suggest Wartenberger realize a few facts about Bush's environmental policy action: Some people think it is happening, some people think it will happen, and some people think the whole idea is ridiculous.

The point is that no one knows. Bush has failed to support an international conference focused on the environment because he has — on the basis of little evidence — already made up his mind. Whether global warming is a problem or not, he's not willing to spend the time or money to find out the whole story.

Instead of finding an answer to satisfy both sides of the spotted owl controversy in the Pacific Northwest, the "esteemed Bush" has suggested the Endangered Species Act be amended to take into account overriding economic factors.

This is contrary to the entire spirit of the act, which is to for once consider the needs of wildlife along with the needs of humans. We will set a dangerous precedent if we begin amending the act every time an endangered species shows up in an inconvenient location.

Where is the evidence of "no net loss of wetlands?" Bush has actually proposed a redefinition of the word "wetland," which will remove protection from millions of acres of marginal wetlands. If you can pull "no net loss" out of that, let me know.

In fact, Bush's idea of an environmental plan appears to be a jaunt to the Grand Canyon to show he's just as much an outdoorsman as the next guy. He may have found the view at the Grand Canyon isn't what it used to be — a comparison of photos taken of it in the 1970s with photos taken recently show a dramatic increase in smog.

By the way, I suggest you might find Cuba or China hospitable. I hear they're fond of people who follow their leaders without questioning them.

SGA questions remain unanswered

There are many questions about the Student Governing Association office renovation that are not being answered accurately by our senators.

How did senators, who voted on the bill for renovation, not notice the absence of furniture in the plans? Why was a conference table with chairs bought when there are already several rooms set up in the K-State Union with this furniture?

Deaf students' rights neglected

Editor,

As a deaf student at K-State, I was appalled and offended by an article written in the Sept. 24 Collegian titled "Interpreters needed; signing classes full."

There was obvious discrimination. I can't believe Gretchen Holden, Physical Limitation Services director, could make a statement as to who should or should not be encouraged to come to K-State based on their majors.

Was she implying that other majors have less importance in comparison to veterinary medicine and agriculture?

I'm surprised K-State would allow an employee to make such statements. She may be having difficulty finding enough interpreters for hearing impaired students, but there is no reason she should be giving preference as to whom should get the services.

The way the article sounded, I am afraid individuals taking the class in sign language are expected to become interpreters by taking one class. But the majority of the deaf clients use a different form of sign language than the one being taught on campus. It takes years to cultivate the ability to become fluent in sign language — just as any other language.

I'm surprised a state university funded with state money isn't putting more effort into providing needed services for deaf clients. For deaf clients, limitations in the choices of universities with certain majors is ever present, and the uncertainty of getting what we need for an equitable education is unreasonable.

I had looked to K-State as one of two universities in Kansas that offers my major. I chose K-State based on the University's ability to provide interpreters as stated in the catalog (page 34, under "Services for Physically Limited Students").

To any deaf student, this information may sound like a guarantee that he or she will have the services needed, but unfortunately, the student finds out a few weeks into the semester how inadequate the services are. So the student wastes time and money.

Hearing loss is not an obvious handicap. It takes someone to understand the deaf and what services they require before these services can be provided.

Even while I love K-State, I still hesitate to recommend this University to any deaf student in the future due to the lack in training and understanding of the needs of such students.

Hill's allegations provide political twist

Editor,

Anita Hill's allegation that Clarence Thomas sexually harassed her gives everyone a unique view of a twist of politics. This twist is the result of conservatives and liberals swapping ideologies in order to strengthen their arguments either for or against Thomas.

On one side, there are many liberals who would normally view giving an accusation equality with a fact, as being a "travesty of justice." However, because Thomas is (let's face it) conservative, they are willing to stand behind Hill's allegation as if it were a fact.

Meanwhile, the conservatives have taken the moral approach saying that Hill's accusation is politically motivated. After all, the Republicans should know all about political motivations after Willie Horton and the commercial about the Democratic congressmen. In short, Hill's allegation gives us another example of the length to which politicians will go to get whatever they want.

Local man rhymes for a reason

Children inspire uncle to write book of poems

JANE ROESNER
Collegian Reporter

Terry Walter of Manhattan cleans the Regis Hairstylists shop at Manhattan Town Center Sundays.

Sometimes, while he's waiting for the store to close, he sits by the fountain in front of Dillard's and looks for friendly faces. He wants to share his work with those people, he said, and get their opinions.

Terry Walter isn't soliciting more jobs for ServiceMaster, the company for which he works. He's putting together a book of children's poems. The 25 poems are basically finished, he said. Now, all that remains is illustrating them.

He said he has to make sure he isn't bothering someone before offering to show his work.

"You don't want to go too far," he said. "I mean, you want to share it with people, but you have to be careful, or you're going to get in trouble."

Most people give him positive feedback about his work, he said. "I only talk to the nice people, or I never talk to them again," he said.

Danny Walter, Terry's brother, said he knew Terry had written poems while in junior high and high school. He wanted to encourage his brother to start writing again, so he asked for two new poems as Christmas presents.

Terry Walter began writing the poems on Christmas Eve 1990 as gifts for his three nieces and two nephews. There was a kind of a magic that Christmas Eve, he said.

"I think at Christmas you are more of a child at heart than at any other time of year," Terry Walter said. "That was when 'The Chief of Moonbeams' and 'A Skipper Bold' were written."

He has tried to hang on to that Christmas Eve feeling while writing each of his poems, to try to recapture that magic, he said.

He also gains inspiration directly from his nieces and nephews. "The Chief of Moonbeams" was written about his 3-year-old niece, Janalee. It depicts the Chief of Moonbeams yelling in frustration at a little girl who won't go to sleep.

"I kind of imagined what it would be like to have a little girl in the house — you know, playing with her dolls, sniffles in the head, squirming in her bed and up for cups of water," he said.

The idea for "A Skipper Bold" came after Terry saw his nephew, John, 6, playing with a toy boat. Janalee helped her uncle by posing for the illustration for "An Articulated Doll."

Janalee has placed her stamp of approval on the poem "The Chief of Moonbeams" by asking for a copy to color, but she wasn't so pleased with "An Articulated Doll," Terry Walter said.

"I wanted her to pose like she was hopping in a mud puddle, and I left her too long," he said. "She kept saying 'I hope I don't have to pose anymore.'"

He said he wants to continue the illustrations and keep corralling people for opinions.

"I want to finish the artwork and have it good enough that the kids like it, because the children and I think the artwork is the most important," he said. "And then we'll see."

He said he is thinking about desktop publishing and perhaps sending it in to a publisher.

"Sure, I'd like to send it into Random House and to get Dr. Seuss' personal publisher to look at it," he said.

In the meantime, he said he's content that his nieces and nephews are happy with the book.

Another niece, 8-year-old Jenny, said her favorite poem is "The Gobble-de-Gooks are Coming," because of the pictures that go with it.

"He made a picture to it of a little man not letting the little ghosts come in his house," she said. "And I thought that the little ghosts were kind of funny."

"I think his poems are pretty nice," she said. "Sometimes, the pictures make the poems seem kind of funnier."

However, even with rave reviews from the children, Terry Walter doesn't know if he'll ever be completely satisfied with his book. "If you're writing for other people like I am," he said, "you constantly want to make it better."

Kansas man may face death penalty

Garden City native convicted of murder, wanted in three states

By the Associated Press

SANTA FE, N.M. — A district attorney in Oklahoma said Tuesday he will try to have Gregg Francis Braun extradited to face murder charges — and a possible death sentence — once Kansas has dealt with him.

And District Attorney Fred Collins said if Braun were sentenced to death in Oklahoma, he would try to keep him there.

Braun, 30, was sentenced last month in New Mexico to life in prison for the 1989 murder of a convenience store clerk during a robbery. He had pleaded guilty but mentally ill.

He also is accused in the slayings of store clerks in Kansas, Oklahoma and Texas.

Prosecutors informally agreed that after the disposition of the New Mexico case, Kansas would get Braun, then Oklahoma, then Texas.

Braun's lawyer, Gary Mitchell, said Monday that Braun intended to plead guilty to two murder counts in his home town of Garden City. He would be sentenced to life in prison, the lawyer said.

But he said Braun would fight extradition to Oklahoma because of the state's death penalty.

"He can fight all he wants. Our plans are to extradite him," Collins said. "Once Kansas is finished with him, I'm going to start coming after him, I suppose."

Collins said if Braun were convicted of first-degree murder, he would try to convince a jury to sentence him to death, using as many of the eight aggravating circumstances prescribed in Oklahoma law as he could apply to the case.

"I'm going to try to get him every way I can legally," said Collins, the

for Cats,
Hawks

It's been exactly 17 years since a K-State-KU game carried as much weight as the meeting will this weekend.

On Oct. 12, 1974, the Jayhawks and the Wildcats entered the contest with 3-1 records, identical to their marks this season. With future pros like Steve Grogan and Gary Spani playing for K-State, and Nolan Cromwell and Mike Butler with KU, a shot at finishing in the upper half of the Big Eight appeared to be at stake.

The buildup was tremendous. Attendance for the game, won by the Jayhawks 20-13, was 43,576, the largest in KSU Stadium history.

That game, however, proved to be a turning point for both squads. Following the win at Manhattan, KU proceeded to lose every one of their six remaining games that season. The Cats managed just one win over lowly Colorado. The two teams that inspired such excitement on Oct. 12 finished tied for dead last in the conference standings.

With the early-season success of both teams 17 years later, this season's meeting has attracted a new brand of enthusiasm. No longer semi-affectionately known as the Toilet Bowl, the game is once again rumored as a chance for one team to finish as high as fourth in the conference.

Is there a lesson to be learned from the flops of the two squads in 1974? Could the optimism for this year's 3-1 Kansas teams be disappointed like it was that season?

Non-conference games are rarely an accurate gauge of a team's ability. Still, the performances of both K-State and KU prior to this season's league slate are reminiscent of those in 1974.

That season, KU walked on three opponents who were caught in atypically weak cycles. Anything but top-ranked opponents from other conferences could not prepare the Hawks for games in the powerful Big Eight.

K-State played an even weaker non-conference schedule, easily beating Tulsa, Wichita State and Pacific. These victories gave no indication of the team's true ability. In their only game with a noteworthy opponent, the Cats lost to Mississippi State 21-16.

Sound familiar? KU danced past Toledo and New Mexico State and slipped by Tulsa before losing last week to its only true challenger, Virginia. Not nearly as powerful as the Virginia team that destroyed the Hawks last season, the Cavaliers were only 2-2 entering the game and gave KU plenty of chances to win. Turnovers and failed opportunities plagued the Hawks, however, who lost 31-19.

K-State didn't play convincingly in its three wins over weaker opponents. While the Cats blew out three of the non-conference teams they were supposed to beat last year, this year they struggled. While K-State was outmatched in its loss to Washington, the Cats failed to challenge the Huskies at any phase of the contest.

Factors could keep history from repeating itself. The conference appears to be a bit weaker than in past years. Oklahoma is the only Big Eight team that has played particularly well outside the conference.

But the enthusiasm over the two teams must be tempered a bit by the fact that non-conference results are inconclusive. The 3-1 record of both teams goes right out the window at kickoff time Saturday, and the field will become a real proving ground for both teams. The results of the 1974 season may seem like ancient history, but the principle continues to apply.

Pirates, Braves try to avoid 'that look'

Aces of past, present to take mound in opener

By the Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Even stars can get the shakes in October.

Doug Drabek had them last year. Tom Glavine, a 20-game winner this year, has them now.

"It's natural to feel that way at this time of year," Pirates pitching coach Ray Miller said as Pittsburgh and Atlanta prepared for Wednesday night's playoff opener.

"The thing you don't want to see is that look on their face," he said. "It's a look we've all seen. You see fear in their eyes. It's happened to the best players. You try to talk to them, and all you see is white spots, things you've never seen before. Then you know you're in trouble."

The Braves say these games are no different than what they went through during their stretch duel with the Los Angeles Dodgers and there's no reason to doubt them.

The Pirates say that last year's playoff experience will help this time.

After going 22-6 in a season that won him the Cy Young Award, Drabek was picked to start Game 2. He gave up a run in the first inning and wound up losing to the Cincinnati Reds 2-1.

"The first part of the game, I was just so anxious to get in there. I was rushing," Drabek said. "What I've learned is how to prepare, not to let all the stuff get to you. Just put it aside, like it's another game, even though you know it's not."

"Because I'm a little nervous, that doesn't mean I won't be confident out there," Glavine said. "I'll try to think of it as a parallel to my start in the All-Star game. But this is different."

"We did expend a lot of energy to get here. I'm sure there are some guys who are happy to be here. That doesn't mean our desire is going to change. We're not finished yet," he said.

"It's been like being in the playoffs for two months," manager Bobby Cox said. "I don't think it's a huge advantage that the Pirates have been here. A lot of our players have been on pennant winners, in stretch drives, on championship caliber ballclubs."

There's Lonnie Smith, trying to become the first player to reach the World Series with four teams. There's Sid Bream, who started for Pittsburgh last year, Terry Pendleton and Charlie Leibrandt.

"A lot of people are saying that we don't seem as excited this year as we were last year," Drabek said. "We are, but the first time we won, we had been together for four years, and we finally did it."

Since then, the Pirates have lost Bream and shortstop Rafael Belliard to the Braves and R.J. Reynolds to Japan. And they're facing the possi-

The Pittsburgh Pirates and the Atlanta Braves begin their best-of-seven series for the National League pennant tonight at Pittsburgh's Three Rivers Stadium. "I don't think there's a sense of urgency to win this year, like it's the last shot we'll have with this team," Drabek said. "Because from year to year, you never know what is going to happen."

"I thought we played well last year, but it just happened the Reds played better," manager Jim Leyland said. "We have to be prepared, but last year's games are behind us. It helps, but you can't tell every individual how to feel."

K-State suffered its fourth consecutive year of frustration against arch-rival Kansas last season as Jayhawk quarterback Chip Hileary broke a long fourth-quarter run to preserve KU's 27-24 win in Lawrence. K-State will try to end the drought Saturday at KSU Stadium.

Rough memories linger for seniors

'Toilet Bowl' tie started slide against KUTODD FERTIG

With the score knotted at 17 and three seconds on the clock, junior kicker Mark Porter rushed on to the field to attempt a 28-yard field goal that would seal a win for K-State over KU.

But in a fashion that seemed fitting for two struggling football programs, the kick was blocked. The game, labeled by some people as "The Toilet Bowl," ended in a tie.

Both teams were so bad, they couldn't even beat each other.

Three K-State-KU meetings have come and gone since that day, but for a few Wildcats who witnessed it from the sideline, the memory lives on.

"From where I was on the sideline, I was right in line with the kick," senior Matt Argo said. "I remember it going up and thinking 'Yeah, we won it,' and then all of a sudden it getting blocked. It was a really frustrating feeling."

The tie in 1987 preceded a string of three consecutive K-State losses to the Jayhawks. For Argo and three other seniors who were redshirt members of the 1987 team, the fact that they have not beaten KU in their careers is one they desperately want to change.

The four Kansas natives have endured four seasons of disappointment in the intrastate rivalry. Argo, of Marysville, Russ Campbell of Wichita, Al Jones of Overland Park, and Doug Warren from Mulvane will play their final game against KU Saturday. All agreed the last opportunity is one they don't want to see slip away.

"I've been looking forward to beating them ever since I've been here," Jones said. "I guess it all boils down to this game for me. This game is to make up for all the games we lost to them over the years."

As for most Kansans, the rivalry runs deep for the four senior natives, deeper than for out-of-state team members. The history of the rivalry adds to the emotion, Argo said.

"My parents have had season tickets since the stadium opened and I remember seeing the games with Gary Spani and all the big-name players," Argo said. "Through the years it's been for the bragging rights for each school."

Three of the past four contests have been decided in the final minutes. Two seasons ago, KU stopped a Wildcat drive on fourth down on the Jayhawk 20 to preserve a 21-16 win. Last year, K-State's 14-point rally in the final period fell short. The manner in which the Cats have lost to KU has added to the disappointment, Campbell said.

"Both of the last two years, we felt like if just a couple of things had gone the other way, we could have had the game," Campbell said. "That makes it really hard to take, knowing that you could have won those games."

In addition to competing on the field, the teams also compete in popularity and recognition. The fact that the progress made by KU the past few seasons has received a great deal of notice has not caused the improving Wildcats to feel slighted, Warren said.

"You've got everyone looking at this person, thinking they're great," Warren said. "If you go out and beat them, it will get you another look from people. It could actually be good for us."

"It can be dangerous to put so much emphasis on one game like this, but I think it is very necessary if you are going to win," Campbell said. "It is such a big game and everyone just naturally gets very intense."

With a renewed feeling of what winning a volleyball match is all about, the K-State volleyball team hits the road again.

The Wildcats will try to win their first Big Eight Conference match today when they play Kansas at 7:30 p.m. at Allen Fieldhouse in Lawrence.

For K-State, the duel with the Jayhawks is the match of the year.

"That's what everybody's telling me," K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said. "I never have experienced a K-State-KU match before. My players have been looking forward to playing them."

But the Cats' chore of maintaining their career series edge of 31-30 will be a difficult one.

K-State, which improved to 6-10 Saturday with a win over UMKC, will face a KU team that won 15 consecutive matches before losing to Oklahoma in five games. KU's current record under Coach Frankie Albitz is 17-3, including wins over Portland, Wichita State and Iowa State — teams that beat K-State.

It's a mark that gained respect from Hagemeyer.

"I think KU has done a great job this year," she said. "This year's start is the best they've ever been off to."

"A part of what has contributed to that are the (five) seniors KU has on its roster. They play a real important role in KU's concept."

One of the seniors is setter Julie Woodruff, who gained conference player of the week honors earlier this season.

Hagemeyer said she thinks KU is motivated by the memory of last year's Big Eight Tournament, in which the Jayhawks lost in a close five-game match to Big Eight power Nebraska.

"They had the chance to experience the Big Eight Tournament last year and they want to go back there," Hagemeyer said.

When the first ball crosses the net tonight, the Cats will be looking for improvement.

"The team always has the goal to win a match," Hagemeyer said. "But that's not the only thing we're going to evaluate in terms of being successful."

"We have no particular tactic (against KU). We're still working on being real intense and being more consistent than in the last match we played."

In tonight's match, Hagemeyer would like to see a confirmation of the partial success in the match against Iowa State last Friday.

"It was the first time that we had more digs and more kills than the team we played against," she said. "And that's a good sign."

Twins start strong, win AL playoff opener

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — The Minnesota Twins keep winning at the Metrodome — even when they have to survive their home to do it.

The Twins won their seventh straight postseason game at the Dome as Jack Morris escaped a Toronto comeback to beat the Toronto Blue Jays 5-4 in Game 1 of the American League playoffs Tuesday night.

For two teams that play a lot of games indoors, it wasn't a pretty display. There were balls lost in the lights and more than a few misjudged drives to the gaps. The best-of-seven series continues Wednesday afternoon.

Minnesota, which went from the AL West cellar last season to win the division this year, built an early lead on uncharacteristic speed and held on with a strong bullpen performance.

It kept the Twins' postseason perfect in the 9-year-old Metrodome. Minnesota's last postseason loss at home was at old Metropolitan Stadium, in the 1970 league playoffs.

Toronto starter Tom Candiotti was chased after 2½ innings, allowing five runs on eight hits. His knuckleball rarely knuckled and little else went right at the start for the startled Blue Jays, who won eight of 12 games against the Twins during the regular season.

The Twins said those games didn't matter, and they proved it at the start, at least.

When the Twins won the World Series in 1987, the noise in the Metrodome was counted among the reasons for the first four-game home sweep in Series history.

The Homer Hankies were out in force again Tuesday and the capacity crowd started raising the noise level to intolerable levels before the game even started. When things got going, Candiotti did nothing to quiet them.

The Twins scored two runs in both the first and second innings and added another in the third.

The Blue Jays rallied for three runs on five consecutive singles off Morris in the sixth inning, with John Olerud driving in a run and Kelly Gruber two. The inning was set up when rookie second baseman Chuck Knoblauch lost Roberto Alomar's one-out pop-up in the lights.

Willis pitched 2½ hitless innings before Rick Aguilera got the last four outs for the save.

National groups to dance, perform

EMILY JOHNSON
A&E Writer

Several international groups will be participating in Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week by displaying music and dances traditional to their cultures. But this week is not the only opportunity for K-State students to experience enculturation through music and dance.

Organizations such as the International Student Center, the General Union of Palestinian Students and The Society for Promotion of Indian Classical Music (Spicmacay) all offer a variety of musical and dance performances for the public.

Spicmacay is a new organization at the University. It has planned concerts for this year — their first is at 7 p.m. Sunday in the K-State Union Little Theatre. The concert will feature musical guest Kanyakmari, a violinist who plays in India's Carnatic style from southern India.

Raja Taranat, a musician of northern India's Kindustani style of music, will be performing Nov. 2 at K-State.

Donna Davis, director of the International Student Center, said the Indian students are a very active association in the University.

Also sharing their music and culture with K-State is the General Union of Palestinian Students. The group represents students from Palestine, Jordan and Latin America. They gather once a week to practice traditional Palestinian dance. These folklore dances are a type of Palestinian celebration often done at weddings and harvest.

Several representatives from the General Union of Palestinian Students will be going to Washington D.C. Oct. 18-20 for the First Annual Convention for New Generation Palestinians. The group will be attending the convention along with 40 to 50 other schools.

"The reason why we were selected this year is because we have this dance group and would like to get eight to 10 dance groups that Palestinian groups have at different campuses," said Motaz Hourani, coordinator of the dance group and president of the group.

Sex and drugs are still jokes for Chong

Raunchy comic from '70s duo will perform in Aggieville

DEREK BOHLKEN
Contributing Writer

One half of the popular 1970s comedy duo, Cheech and Chong, graces a Manhattan stage this week.

Tommy Chong brought his raunchy act to Bushwacker's Tuesday night and will do it again tonight at 9 and 10:30.

"It's as dirty as it always has been," said Chong, who just recently returned to stand-up after a 12-year layoff. "I use some of the old stuff, but what I can't remember, I can't use."

He said fans can expect much of the same type of comedy that made Cheech and Chong so popular.

"There will be lots of references to drugs," he said. "Lots of dope jokes, sex jokes and some Blind Melon Chitlin' Blues."

Chong has been to Kansas before. His bad memories stem from the box-office failure of his movie, "Far Out, Man."

"I came there about two years ago to promote it. It didn't do well. The critics trashed it and nobody came to see it."

The 53-year-old actor/comedian said he's been involved with comedy for 54 years — his mother did stand-up while pregnant — and will probably do stand-up comedy for the rest of his life.

"Doing stand-up is totally different from movies," he said. "If something is wrong with the act, you can change it."

He said he hasn't mellowed with age.

"People ask me if I still do dope jokes," Chong said. "Shit yeah. I do dope jokes, sex jokes. I'm obsessed with sex. The show is one heck of a good time. Just don't come expecting to gain some new insight into the world."

Library

novation plan for Farrell Library drafted by professional consultants last year and announced in February.

The Student Senate will decide if students will vote on a $5-million referendum in November to meet the student contribution to the University libraries project.

The plan for Farrell includes state funds, $5 million in private gifts and $5 million from students.

During the past several months, the donors have indicated repeatedly they believe the referendum is written as a challenge to K-State alumni and friends, as well as the state.

"The donors view the referendum as a challenge in that student support will follow private sector support," said Art Loub, KSU Foundation president. "The apparent student commitment, as outlined in the referendum, weighed heavily in the donors' decision."

Marjorie Morse said they are hoping to exceed the Essential Edge goal of $3 million for the University library systems.

"The anonymous donors apparently thought that a good library system is essential to a good university, and that this gift to the library is really a gift to the faculty, staff and especially the students," she said.

President Jon Wefald said, "In essence, students and the private sector are sending a message to the state that we need this library addition and are willing to pay our fair share and expect the state of Kansas to pay for its share."

Farrell, the smallest library in the Big Eight, has drawn criticism from a variety of student groups who have sought, in turn, to expand the library, increase its holdings and enhance its budget.

Positive student activism convinced the administration to move Farrell from fifth place to first place on the University's priority list.

"To remain a national leader among teaching and research universities, K-State must provide adequate library resources for our students and faculty," Wefald said. "Our students recognized the need and accepted a challenge."

Diverse musical tastes are a must

PAT WALLECK

If music makes the world go 'round, then a great record collection is essential. So, diversify to justify your taste.

As we've grown up through those painfully embarrassing prepubescent years to well-groomed, well-studied college students, we've all made a choice in what style of music we prefer.

I still remember those days when I — yes, I — thought the Village People ruled. The first concert I attended as a 12-year-old was, indeed, the Village People.

You may be wondering how this blues enthusiast got to be so hardcore into the blues after that nightmarish period in my life. The key is diversity.

It seems like the music we've grown up with was like a bad dad. Just another polyester suit to be left to the moths in the hall closet.

But it isn't so. I've made many musical choices in my adolescence — from the Village People to Queen

(no wonder I'm moderately homophobic), from Van Halen to AC/DC, and even from Frank Sinatra to Bobby Darin. I've run the gamut of musical styles. I listened to everything to find out what I truly liked.

To the general public, blues may not be the most popular style. Blues is not for everybody. But decide on the music of your choice and be open to other possibilities.

If all you've listened to since junior high is alternative, then buy some country music. Chances are you might actually like the stuff. In some cases, the lyrics have more meaning without being fluffy or overly poetic.

Take George Jones' song about being depressed about a woman. The lyrics read, "Yabba dabba doo, the King is gone and so are you." Robert Smith of the Cure would be proud.

Heavy metal lovers should get into classical music. Some of the great guitarists like Joe Satriani and Yngwie Malmsteen have been digging on Mozart and Bach for years.

Most of those thundering and pulsating guitar licks came from those dudes who lived more than 200 years before the electric guitar was invented.

I'm not ashamed to admit where my own roots came from. I still tap my toes when I hear "YMCA." It became an instinct. If you have those old records and tapes (or 8-tracks) around, pull them out and listen to them.

HOMECOMING Ambassadors

Two student ambassadors are to be announced at halftime of the K-State-KU football game Saturday. One man and one woman will be selected to represent the University.

All applicants were granted an interview, which was conducted by a panel of eight students. The panel then selected seven women and six men.

A faculty committee then interviewed these students and heard each one give a presentation on Making a K-Statement, the 1991 Homecoming theme. From this interview process, the committee chose four women and four men from the applicants, who are now vying for the K-State ambassador title.

Amy Rentz, assistant director of the KSU Alumni Association, said students can vote from 9 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the K-State Union outside the Stateroom Wednesday through Friday. Students will need their student IDs to vote.

Renz said the students who are chosen will travel to alumni events across the state and will be involved in specific University events on campus.

"It is very important for students to vote, because these two ambassadors will represent K-State to prospective students and alumni," Renz said.

Renz said the ambassador program is good because it offers an opportunity for two more students to get involved at the University level.

This page presents the ambassador candidates and their statements to you, the students choosing the two ambassadors.

John Niemann, sophomore in agricultural business

Since I have attended K-State, I have seen many areas of this University grow and improve. We have taken the talents of many students and utilized them to their fullest potential.

Although many may feel K-State has some problems, I believe it is definitely the best place for myself and others to obtain a good education. We have seen this University take many of the negatives and turn them into positives. We have seen the University grow as one of the premier research and technological universities in the nation.

Some people may think that winning such awards or such things as a football game is just a matter of luck. Well, I strongly believe in the equation of luck; it's when preparation meets opportunity. K-State has definitely made many efforts through optimism and leadership to prepare itself and its students for the opportunities of the future.

This brings me to my point of running for ambassador. I want to serve the University as a positive and motivated ambassador who genuinely cares about the future of K-State.

I believe that I possess the communication skills necessary for achieving the goals and needs of the University. My job consists of the recruitment of students as well as a liaison between the University and the K-State alumni.

I have had the opportunity to serve in a similar position before, and it would definitely be an honor to serve the students of K-State as the 1991-92 ambassador. I want to help our University in continuing its road to success in making a K-Statement!

Susanne Schmeling, senior in radio-television and political science

Someone who knows K-State inside and out — this is a K-State ambassador.

The two people who will be chosen to represent our University Saturday take on a huge responsibility. They must represent the whole student body to alumni, potential students and parents and other influential people around the state and nation. In order to do this, they must have a complete knowledge of K-State's history, present issues and where our University is going in the future.

I feel I am well suited to fulfill this responsibility to the University with a personal and caring touch.

I am a senior in radio-television and political science. Some of my experience in public relations and communications include being the student life editor of the 1990 Royal Purple yearbook, a College of Arts and Sciences ambassador, public relations chairwoman for Chimes Junior Honorary. I was the head of public relations for K-State Parent's Weekend 1990, vice president of public relations for Kappa Delta sorority, resident assistant for West Hall and part-time disc jockey at KMKF-FM 101.5.

I've been lucky enough to live in the residence halls, off campus and a sorority, so I feel like I can really relate to the diverse student population.

If you elect me as K-State ambassador for 1991-92, I can promise you I'll do my best to represent you and this University. When it comes to bragging about K-State, it's hard to get me to stop talking.

Mike Farmer, senior in management/marketing

As a third-year student, K-State has afforded me many opportunities and memories. These include everything from simply walking around campus, Homecoming, getting to know outstanding professors, the "Ville", tearing down the goal posts, and finally the many, many friends I've made.

It is these experiences that came to mind when I initially decided to run for ambassador. I guess these feelings have culminated into what can be described as "pride" — purple pride at that.

My involvement at K-State has given me an excellent perspective of the many diverse activities this campus has to offer. Activities that challenge everybody to be the best in their areas of interest. I feel I have the qualifications to represent the University in a manner that the students want to be represented. As your ambassador, I would like to inform people what K-State has to offer.

Finally, and most importantly, I want to represent you, the students of K-State. It is the students who make up what K-State stands for. I see K-State's statement as a university with much pride tempered with a sense of humility. I want to bring this "K-Statement" to prospective students, alumni and other people around the country.

Jon Hixson, junior in milling science management

I would like to represent K-State as a student ambassador. I feel I can present to potential students and alumni some of the many great aspects of K-State.

K-State presents challenges and opportunities to everyone. The challenges and opportunities would not have been created or fulfilled without the continual input of great new students and constant support from alumni. Especially now, in difficult financial times, it is important that the quality of our students and the support of the alumni are maintained. Only by making a conscious effort in these areas can their levels of achievement be maintained or improved.

I realize that to make this effort successful, a great deal of time is needed, and I am eager to have the opportunity to make the commitment to being a student ambassador.

I have worked with student recruitment and have been involved in alumni events. I feel these activities will give me a good background to fulfill the position of ambassador. I enjoy working with and meeting new people, and feel I could present a positive image the University as a K-State ambassador.

Since I came to K-State three years ago, I have grown to appreciate all the things this university has to offer.

K-State is a national center of scholarship where students and faculty from all around the world are constantly recognized for their achievements and excellence.

K-State is a melting pot where multiple ideas and cultures come together to achieve harmony. It is a friendly and warm place where many people offer a smile and a caring welcome every day. These are qualities I consider important in a university environment, and I would like to present these qualities to new students interested in pursuing a higher education.

K-State is more than a school to me. It's more than lecture classes, homework assignments and lab reports.

K-State is a place where lifelong friends are made. It's a place where student scholars achieve lofty goals that are noted around the country. It's made up of sports enthusiasts who back their teams with a vengeance.

Musicians at K-State polish their skills to performance quality. Scholarship winners are recognized almost daily. K-State's student publications continually receive the highest national awards.

Service clubs and organizations donate countless hours to Manhattan and the surrounding communities. More than 1,000

Denny Clock, junior in business management and hotel and restaurant management

How to write, "why you would like to become a K-State ambassador," without sounding like a schloob — a difficult task to say the least. As an occasional event calls you away from Aggieville on a Saturday night, this one has for me. I think it is important to put a great deal of effort and thought into the things you speak and write about. This thought leads me into the reason why I would like to become a K-State ambassador: it's a chance to convey the truth.

Many people's first contact with K-State is when they meet an ambassador. First impressions mean a good deal in these meetings, and speaking the plain and simple truth about what goes on at K-State has a profound effect on those who listen.

A large amount of effort and thought go into speaking the truth. It's about balancing the good things going on at K-State with the difficulties we are experiencing. It consists of addressing the problems here and demonstrating how we are working to solve these problems. The truth gives an alumni a chance and a reason to get involved, and it shows a prospective student that K-State is a real place that teaches you about real life.

A chance to convey the truth. That is why I would like to become a K-State ambassador.

As a K-State ambassador, I would like to exemplify all the unique characteristics of K-State. I would like to encourage young minds from all backgrounds to allow K-State to further their educations in a diverse and distinct environment — a well-rounded education is becoming essential to daily life.

Being a K-State ambassador is an excellent opportunity for personal growth. It would allow me to further my leadership skills and interpersonal abilities.

As an international scholar, it would be an honor for me to represent the K-State student body in meeting and welcoming new friends — students, faculty and alumni — to our campus.

intramural teams at K-State compete at national levels of competition.

All of these activities make up a diverse group of students. That's what makes K-State so much more than books and tests.

I would love to represent K-State for all of the things this school has to offer. I'm proud to say I'm a student at K-State, and I'm eager to share all this school has to offer.

To be an ambassador would be the highest honor because it would give me the chance to say, "This is our school — take a look at what we're doing."

K-State is more than a school to me. It's a network of exciting, friendly, dedicated people. And I am proud to be a part of it.

Thefts of bicycles increase

Cable cutters, quick release wheels contribute to heisted bikes

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

Security is the defense against a rise in campus bike theft, K-State Police said.

As of Tuesday, 45 bikes have been stolen from racks on campus, nine more than were reported this time last year.

Campus Police Investigator Richard Herrman said lack of security and registration by students who own bikes is part of the problem.

"Anyone can register their bikes here. They just have to come down and fill out a form, and it will be filed," he said.

"Without records of a stolen bicycle, we have no way to trace them at all, and the owners usually lose out."

Stolen bicycle reports on campus are widespread, but many are reported in areas around the dorms where many people are concentrated into a small area.

Most of the thefts occur at night and are perpetrated by cutting chains and cables.

Herrman said it's difficult to detect the exact times of the thefts because they are not always reported immediately after the theft is discovered.

"Better chains would help solve some of the problems," Herrman said. "Cables aren't very reliable."

A three-eighths-of-an-inch, case-hardened chain is sturdy and secure, he said. It's important for people to remember to put the locks through the frame and the front wheel, he said.

"We have a lot of problems with quick-release wheels because they are easily stolen," Herrman said.

Campus police promote bicycle security and urge students to take all precautions to stop theft on campus.

Engraving equipment is available at the police department and may be checked out with a student ID. People who choose engraving should use their driver's license

Bike auction

■ Auction takes place at 5 p.m. today at East Stadium.

■ Proceeds go to a general fund.

number, Herrman said. Records of all driver's license numbers are kept on file at the Motor Vehicles Department.

Recording a bicycle's serial number and mailing it to the manufacturer is also helpful. Once recorded, they can be entered into the National Crime Information Computer. This allows investigators to trace a bicycle more easily if it is sold somewhere else. Otherwise, it is usually hard to trace the bike back to the owner.

"A good way to save a bicycle, in addition to everything else, is to write down all of its pertinent information on a piece of plastic with a permanent marker and insert it into the seat tube or the handle bars," Herrman said.

Most bikes stolen on campus aren't found. But some bicycles do turn up without owners, and the police have a bicycle auction each year to sell bicycles collected on campus during the year.

These bicycles are either abandoned on campus or left in unlawful places, so the campus police gather them and store them for at least six months.

If the bikes aren't claimed within the six months, they are sold in the auction. This year's auction will be at 5 p.m. today at the police department in East Stadium.

About 42 bicycles of many sizes and brands will be auctioned, and the proceeds will go into a general fund for things such as increased bicycle security.

Police are currently testing new locks that could possibly be installed on campus, pending funding.

Dance

dent of the General Union of Palestinian Students.

The Palestinian dance group will be performing for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week at 2:30 p.m. Thursday in Union Station.

Hourani said he feels music is a very important form of expression for the Palestinians.

"When you mention something about Palestinians, you usually have some political problem in mind," he said. "For us, by exposing this type of traditional music and dances we are conveying a message of something more than politics to being a Palestinian. It says we have our own culture, our own traditions and heritage that we would like to keep alive and going on. We do have other aspects to our culture."

Also represented at K-State is the African culture and its music. "Into Africa" has been a program on K-

State's KSDB-FM 92 for two years. Kouassi Kouakou is the host of the program which airs every Saturday from 10 a.m. to 1 p.m. "Into Africa" plays primarily African pop music with some traditional African music as well. During the program Kouakou adds small feature segments to his show discussing African issues and history.

Cliff Clifford is the host of "Reggae Extravaganza" on KSDB every Sunday from noon to 3 p.m. Clifford's program started in April 1989 and is full of Reggae music originating from Jamaica.

Whether it be on the radio or in public, ethnic music is being well represented at K-State. Its importance is not just in sound, but also in message.

"Music is a way to learn about one another," Davis said. "We have to get to know one another whether it be through our food, dance or music. It offers a hopeful outlook to making a more peaceful place."

Diverse

If they don't make you vomit, then they might make you appreciate the style of music you are into right now.

You can make your choice seem well thought out just by saying, "Look at what I used to listen to. My new choice is made by deductive reasoning. I've sifted through all of these other forms and styles, and this is truly the one I think is best."

What an intelligent way to justify your choice. Tell your parents you have actually thought hard about your choice of music by being diverse in listening.

Parents, even if they don't like your haircut, might accept your musical style and even give you money to buy more tapes of your choice.

And if that doesn't work, just say, "Ah, c'mon Dad, get real. Elvis is dead. It's time to move on."

questions. Business Senator Derek Nelson said the only way to get the expansion and improvement issues passed by students would be to combine them.

"If you have separate issues, people will pair them against each other and both will lose," he said.

Graduate Senator Joel Gruenke said combining the two questions was a way to fool students into voting the way Senate wants.

"You say you don't want to pair them against one another because people will choose their preference. That's the point. That's the way it should be," he said. "The purpose of a referendum is to find out what the students think, not tell them."

On another issue, Heitschmidt attempted and failed to veto a bill allocating money to Campus Crusade for Christ to pay for a speaker on Satanism.

In a typed memo, Heitschmidt said since it is not possible for Senate to equally fund all religious groups, it should fund none.

Gruenke said denying the group funding would be an arbitrary and capricious decision.

"We would be violating the group's First Amendment rights," he said. "The speaker will be educational and provide diversity."

At the end of the meeting, a bill was approved to buy the improperly ordered SGA office furniture which is currently stored in the K-State Union.

There was little debate on the furniture issue, which Nelson said sickened him.

"We heard up and down and all over about ethics when we debated for two and a half hours over the referendum, yet we spend only 20 minutes on something we have been calling morally wrong for three weeks," he said.

Derek Thoman, arts and sciences senator and Faculty Senate representative, came late to Tuesday's meeting and gave a brief report on that body's activities.

"I heard their Academic Affairs Committee will be voting next Tuesday on whether to charge people money to drop and add classes," he said.

The committee meet at 3:30 p.m. Tuesday in Union 212.

district attorney for the five-county 20th Judicial District, based in Carter County.

Collins said if Braun were sentenced to die, he would try to keep him in Oklahoma rather than return him to New Mexico or Kansas.

"If there were any way I could do it legally, I would try to pursue that avenue," the prosecutor said.

"You've got to consider the deterrent effect to society. Because assuming he's found guilty, you've got to do what you can to discourage that kind of activity," Collins said.

Braun, 30, is accused of shooting three people in the head during the robbery of an Ardmore, Okla., flower shop. Two of the victims survived.

The crime occurred July 21, 1989, two days before Braun shot and killed Geraldine Valdez in Springer. The two Kansas murders — of clerks from separate convenience stores — occurred July 19, and the Pampa, Texas, murder of a photo processing shop owner July 20.

The Finney County Attorney's office in Kansas is preparing paperwork for Braun's return to Kansas.

Emergency phones not just for safety

Information can be gained through use of system

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Emergencies are not just threats to one's personal safety, said K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom.

"When you're in the middle of 664 acres surrounded by buildings and you've got a meeting to attend, but you don't know where you're at, that's an emergency too," Beckom said.

Whatever the emergency — personal safety, general information or any other — a person can contact the K-State Police for help by using one of the 18 emergency phones around campus.

In the late 1970s, the K-State Police Department worked with a committee to look for things that could be done to promote a safer campus.

Beckom said they found people who were on the outskirts of campus or in the parking lots didn't have access to the police department.

"We felt like there was a need for people to have access to our office without having to go into a building or getting back into their cars," Beckom said.

Beckom said they decided the emergency phones were the best option because they provided a means for safety, as well as a way of gaining general information.

Beckom said, however, not many people use the phones.

He estimated that only about 10 calls come in during each month. K-State Police Dispatcher Linda Marvin said she didn't understand why people didn't use the phones more.

"Maybe they think it has to be an emergency, like an accident or rape, before they can use the phone," she said.

"Students will walk from A2 to the police department in order to get help because they have locked their keys in the car when all they have to do is use an emergency phone," Marvin said.

Once a person pushes the button on any emergency phone, two things will happen, Beckom said. A campus police dispatcher will answer the call, and a police unit will be sent to the phone to check out the scene.

He said as soon as the dispatcher answers the phone, all the person has to do is talk.

"The nice thing about the phones is that whether or not the person can speak, the dispatcher can hear approximately 10-20 feet around the phone," Beckom said.

The phones are placed in heavily traveled areas and parking lots, he said.

"The next one will probably be installed north of Justin Hall because the parking lot may be redone," Beckom said.

Beckom said installing the phones was costly.

To install the post, concrete base and light would cost between $2,300 and $3,000, he said. The phone itself costs about $500 plus the cost for a phone line.

Even as they reluctantly agreed to the delay, Republicans vented anger that a private committee report on Hill's allegations was leaked to the media. Sen. Hank Brown, R-Colo., Judiciary Committee member, said he would demand appointment of a special prosecutor to investigate unspecified violations of Senate rules.

Under the agreement reached Tuesday night, the vote on the Thomas nomination was delayed exactly one week, until 5 p.m. CDT Oct. 15.

Mitchell said the delay was "to give time for further inquiry into this matter by the Judiciary Committee." He did not specify what action the committee would take.

Seven of 13 Democrats who had announced their support for Thomas — Alan Dixon of Illinois, Richard Bryan and Harry Reid of Nevada, Joseph Lieberman of Connecticut, J. James Exon of Nebraska, Wyche Fowler of Georgia and Richard Shelby of Alabama — all called for a delay in the vote.

If supporters forced a vote, "this senator would be in a position to vote against the nomination," Bryan said. Exon said he would either abstain or vote against Thomas if the vote were Tuesday.

Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., Thomas' sponsor in the Senate, proposed that the Senate Judiciary Committee hear testimony from Thomas and Hill.

Mitchell met privately with Dole and others as a growing number of senators urged postponement.

Sen. Joseph Biden, D-Del., Judiciary Committee chairman, reversed his earlier position and joined the call.

President Bush, asked in late afternoon if he was standing by the nomination, said, "You're darn right."

Thomas remained out of public view. Danforth released a sworn affidavit in which the nominee said, "I totally and unequivocally deny Anita Hill's allegations of misconduct of any kind toward her, sexual or otherwise."

"At all times during the period she worked with me, our relationship was strictly professional," Thomas said. "During that time and subsequently, the relationship has been wholly cordial."

"These allegations are untrue," Thomas said in the affidavit he had signed earlier in the day. "I am terribly saddened and deeply offended by these allegations."

Danforth said, as he released the affidavit, there was no reason to postpone the vote because Hill's allegations were known by most senators and the public.

"To keep this alive is just to keep the torture going. It's time to get this man off the rack," said Danforth, who hired Thomas for his first legal job and brought him to Washington as a Senate aide.

On the Senate floor, Danforth said the confirmation process had turned into "the worst kind of sleazy political campaign, with no effort spared to assassinate the character of Clarence Thomas."

Danforth also produced telephone logs Thomas kept as chairman of the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission indicating that Hill telephoned him 11 times during a 34-year period after she left the agency. She had worked for him earlier at the Education Department.

The senator also read from an affidavit by Carlton Stewart, a former EEOC official who said he overheard Hill praise Thomas' nomination at last August's American Bar Association convention in Atlanta.

Hill, flanked by three bodyguards and surrounded by reporters and photographers, made her way into the University of Oklahoma Law School Tuesday afternoon, declining to answer questions.

Course demands speed

would happen if they didn't get their M-16 and the belt and suspenders holding a canteen and first aid pouch on the ground in 15 seconds, but they didn't seem to want to find out, either.

With lightning speed, they grounded their equipment and lined up in formation.

As Holdeman looked them over, a stray cadet in the back quietly scurried to an open spot in the front.

"Now, I know after the warrior assault course, the obstacle course seems wimpy, but there is nothing wimpy about it. Safety is of the utmost importance, and your goal is to get through here as fast as you can — safely.

"And remember, everybody has a buddy. You don't proceed to the next obstacle until your buddy does. You've got to do this as a squad. Now get behind the ready line!" Holdeman's voice changed to an intimidating bark again.

Cadets went through the 15-obstacle course eight to 10 at a time climbing a cargo net, crossing over a 15-foot drop on a two-rope bridge and flinging themselves against a high wall which they were supposed to climb over in three movements — but without any hand or footholds.

"This is why we do push-ups," Army Capt. Allen West said as a cadet struggled to climb a rope.

But all of the cadets made it through the obstacle course, whether they liked it or not.

"I wanted to go over it but not face first," said a female cadet as her buddy helped push her over the high wall.

At the end of the day, the cadets had an after-action review of the weekend's exercise. They evaluated everything from their first night patrol, to not remembering to check the concertina wire for booby traps before crossing it.

The cadets said they believed the experience was one worth giving up a weekend for.

"I'm not just out here for nothing," said Cadet MS I Chris Hawver, freshman in sociology. "I'm out here to challenge myself, for the experience and the chance to get through school on a scholarship.

"Everything may be simulated, but we take it very seriously," he said.

Taking it seriously sometimes isn't enough, though.

"Sometimes you feel like you know nothing, like you're starting from scratch as you try to climb up a 10-foot tank ditch," Hawver said.

"But you find out the cadet officer yelling at you to move your butt is the first one to help you over if you think you can't do it."

Having decided that their break was long enough, Holdeman called the cadets back into formation to load up with their rucksacks and weapons. For a day's exercise well done, their reward was a 2.5-mile road march back to home base.

Tired, but not discouraged, the cadets loaded the 40-pound rucksacks onto their backs, and somewhere a voice started up a cadence.

Their boots stamped down the dirt road in unison as they formed two lines. They wore the same uniform, but the experience had been different for each of them. Rucksacks were no problem for some and dwarfed others, but they each carried their own weight.

Cadet Ilsa Waterman, sophomore in anthropology, descends a chain ladder, one of the obstacle course's many steps.
BRAD SIEGFREID/Collegian

Dodging enemy fire, Andrew Beihl, senior in history, runs through the Warrior Assault Course, which consisted of blanks and fake grenades. The student's day began at 5 a.m. and ended late Saturday.

Supremacist pleads innocent in slaying

By the Associated Press

JACKSON, Miss. — A white supremacist, twice tried in the 1963 murder of NAACP leader Medgar Evers, pleaded innocent Tuesday, 27 years after two all-white juries failed to convict him.

"I plead not guilty, sir," said Byron De La Beckwith, 70, who was extradited from Tennessee last week.

After the plea, Beckwith's court-appointed attorneys filed a motion in Hinds County Circuit Court requesting that bond be set. A judge was expected to rule this week.

"I can't speak for what happened in Tennessee, but the Mississippi constitution provides he's entitled to bail unless he will pose either a special risk of danger to the community, which I think is obvious he won't, or if he's a special risk to flee," said defense attorney Merrida Coxwell.

"You answer to yourself how this gentleman, with as much nationwide publicity as he's getting, could flee anywhere in the United States."

District Attorney Ed Peters said he would ask Beckwith be denied bond and request a high cash bond if the judge ruled otherwise. Peters said bonds in murder cases usually range from $50,000 to $100,000.

"I don't know if we can deny him bond," Peters said. "The fact it took us nine months to get him back certainly indicates he doesn't intend to abide by the jurisdiction of this court that he's avoided."

Eddie Hawkins (Bruce Willis), also known as Hudson Hawk, just got out of prison after 10 years and he's not planning on going back. The world's greatest cat burglar is officially retired and nobody is going to change his mind. Darwin and Minerva Mayflower (Richard E. Grant, Sandra Bernhard), however, need a thief, and they will settle for only the best. They give Hawk an extra incentive to return to his former profession- they will kill his best friend, Tommy (Danny Aiello), if he doesn't. Rated R (85 min.)

Higher ticket prices don't deter Cat fans

Sold-out stadium expected for annual K-State-KU game

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

Before Wildcat fans plan for the big K-State-KU game Saturday, they should consider how much it will cost.

Game tickets are priced at $20.50 apiece — $4 more than the single-ticket price for other home games.

Athletic Director Milt Richards said he is sensitive to the students' needs and is not looking to do anything unfair. However, he said, intercollegiate athletics do cost money.

Richards said he was not sure about ticket prices from previous years since he has only been athletic director this semester.

"It's not odd for an institution to charge more for a premiere game," Richards said. "Students could have taken advantage of the season ticket prices."

Richards said the game should be sold out by opening kickoff despite the hike in ticket prices.

Becky Culbertson, junior in criminal justice, said the higher price was not that big of a deal.

SEATS ARE WAITING

- There are still seats available for the K-State-KU game.
- An additional 4,000 folding-chair seats will also be sold.
- Tickets are $20.50 — $4 more than any other K-State home game.

"It won't make or break me," she said. "Besides, if K-State plays the way they have been, it should be a great game."

K-State Ticket Manager Carol Adolph said Tuesday that about 1,500 reserved seats are still available for the game.

An additional 4,000 folding-chair seats will also be sold. The temporary seats will be set up between the runways leading to the football office locker rooms behind the north end zone.

Bush supports Thomas

New hearings to begin Friday, says judiciary committee chairman

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — President Bush on Wednesday declared he still had "total confidence" in Clarence Thomas and called his embattled Supreme Court nominee to the White House for a picture-taking session in a public display of support.

The day after the Senate decided to delay his confirmation vote until after public hearings on the allegations of sexual harassment against him, Thomas smiled for photographers and said he was feeling fine.

Asked if he would be able to refute the accusations, he responded, "Just testify. Thanks."

The Senate Judiciary Committee is expected to hold hearings Friday and possibly Saturday to hear testimony from Thomas and from Anita Hill, the Oklahoma law professor who made the allegations.

Sen. John Danforth, Thomas' chief Senate sponsor, said the nominee would "look the American people in the eye" and deny he said or did anything improper to the former aide.

"I've got strong feelings but they all end up in strong support for Clarence Thomas," Bush said. "I support Clarence Thomas, and there's no wavering, there's no condition. And that's where it is. And that's the way it's going to stay."

Senate Democratic Leader George Mitchell defended the Senate's handling of Hill's allegations that Thomas repeatedly made sexually explicit remarks to her when they worked together nearly a decade ago in the Reagan administration.

Mitchell rejected criticism by women's groups and others that the Senate had dragged its feet investigating the charges. He said the Senate's hands were tied because Hill had initially insisted on keeping her allegations confidential.

Before the allegations became public, Hill had insisted that only members of the Senate Judiciary Committee be told about her allegations "and it not be made available to anyone beyond that," the Maine Democrat said.

All the Democrats on the panel, but not every Republican member, were briefed about the allegations before the committee voted 7-7 and sent the nomination to the Senate floor without a recommendation.

"The reality is we did confront a very serious situation. There were conflicting interests, and ultimately, I believe the manner in which we agreed to proceed was appropriate and fair," Mitchell said.

Hill, who has said she will come to Washington to testify, told police in Norman, Okla., on Monday that she had received at least three harassing telephone calls after her allegations about Thomas were made public.

Thomas was quoted Monday by his chief Senate sponsor, Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., as saying he wanted testify to "clear my name."

"He will appear before the committee and testify under oath and look the members of the committee in the eye and look the American people in the eye and say simply that this is not true," Danforth said on ABC's "Good Morning America."

A number of Democratic senators who are not on the Judiciary Committee said they were unhappy with the way Hill's allegations had been handled. Seven Democrats who had publicly endorsed Thomas' nomination asked for a delay in the vote after her charges came to light.

Frosh denied cheerleader spot

Lack of collegiate look cited as reason by adviser

Gary Witmer (center), and Eugene Nelson are doused by Riley County rural firefighter Mitch Blockolsky, who puts out flames approaching them. The two were lounging by a campfire near the house when the fire spread across the lawn. When they saw smoke behind the house, they decided to take action. They attempted to put it out themselves.

Fire partially burns vacant house

Witnesses fail to extinguish minor grass fire caused by cooking fire

A southeast Manhattan house was partially burned when an outdoor cooking fire got out of hand Wednesday.

No one was living inside the house at Box 27, Noon St., but two men said they live in a pickup camper on the ground in the backyard.

"Some newspaper flew off the cooking fire and caught the grass," said Gary Witmer, one of the men living in the camper.

He said he tried to put the grass fire out. It burned a trail of grass around the side of the house to the back yard.

"We thought we had it out, then a couple of hours later I saw smoke in the house," he said. "I guess it got up under the house into the rotten wood."

Witmer said he lives there only part of the time.

Eugene Nelson said he owned the land and house, which used to belong to his parents. He said he has lived there all his life.

The house has no running water. Witmer said they fill gallon jugs with water down the street.

He said he had been on the roof and poured two gallons of water on the fire before the firefighters arrived.

Mitch Blockolsky of the Riley County Rural Fire Department said the fire was unnecessary and could have been prevented.

"With something like this, you could get three or four people killed," he said.

He said ignorance and carelessness caused the fire.

The house appeared to be constructed out of an old boxcar.

Boyd Hall rejects 24-hour visitation

STEPHANIE WATSON

Boyd Hall residents defeated a proposal for 24-hour visitation in a close vote Tuesday night.

Boyd residents did vote, however, to extend the hours that male visitors could stay.

Lara Miller, junior in music and president of Boyd Hall, said that residents had the option to vote for a 24-hour or a restricted visitation policy.

Miller said that 54 percent of the residents voted for restricted visitation, and 46 percent voted for 24-hour visitation.

"We had 93 percent of the residents vote," Miller said. "We were very happy to have such a high turnout."

Brenda Moeder, assistant director of Strong Complex, said that the residents also got to vote on whether or not they would have to continue to yell "man on floor" whenever a male guest is with them.

Residents voted against having to extend the warning, and the restricted policy was extended.

"The current visitation hours are 10 a.m. to 1 a.m. Monday through Thursday and 24 hours on weekends," Moeder said.

"The new visitation hours, which will go into effect Sunday, will be from 8 a.m. to 2 a.m. Monday through Thursday with the weekends staying the same," she said.

She also said that residents will still have to escort male visitors at all times.

Minority numbers down

Decrease reflects total enrollment decline

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

Until this fall, minority enrollment at K-State has been increasing each year.

The registrar's office current statistics show K-State with a minority population of 1,423, a slight decline from last year's enrollment figure of 1,444.

The percentage of minorities compared to the total student population at K-State has remained between four and six percent over the past five years, said Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs.

Because the student population has declined from slightly more than 21,000 students to 20,000, the decline in minority numbers is only natural, she said.

In actuality, the minority population has stabilized. The minority percentage this fall is six percent of the student population, Taylor-Archer said.

The University of Kansas experienced an increase this fall in minority population. In fall 1990 there were 1,747 minorities, and this year

■ Although the total number of minority students is down, the minority enrollment is about the same percentage as the past few years.

BOYD'S VOTE

■ Boyd Hall residents defeat a proposal for 24-hour visitation.

■ A restricted visitation policy — extension of hours male visitors can stay — will be in effect, however, for the remainder of the year.

Michelle Ryan, junior in journalism

Being an ambassador means having a great knowledge of the University. Besides knowing the facts and figures, it's having a good understanding of what it's really like to be a K-State student.

Through the past three years, I've come to know what college life is really like by living in a residence hall, being a part of the greek system and being involved in several clubs and organization. Through these experiences, I have learned to work with and understand a variety of different people and their cultures.

Coming from a large family of K-Staters, I have always heard what a wonderful university this is, but it wasn't until I came to college that I realized how much K-State has to offer. I have had many great experiences here and have developed a strong sense of pride in K-State. I am excited and enthusiastic about sharing that pride with other people.

I love to travel, meet new faces and new friends, and that is what much of the K-State ambassador program is about. By being a part of the Student Alumni Board, I have gotten first-hand experience in visiting with prospective students, parents and alumni, promoting K-State and serving as a recruiting tool.

I am knowledgeable about the University in both statistics and everyday life. More importantly, I feel I would be an honest and positive representation of K-State, and I am excited about having the chance to be a part of the K-State ambassador program.

REGION

K.C., Linn County to get help from feds

KANSAS CITY, Kan. (AP) — The federal government said Wednesday that unemployment is high enough in Kansas City, Kan., and in Linn County to qualify the areas for special consideration in awarding federal contracts.

The city and the county met the criteria of having an unemployment rate of at least 6.6 percent.

The government will give special consideration to the two areas in awarding contracts from Oct. 1 to Sept. 30, 1992, the Department of Labor said.

RACIAL/ETHNIC HARMONY WEEK

MIKE VENSO/Staff

Bertrice Berry, comedienne and lecturer for Racial and Ethnic Harmony Week, tells people gathered Wednesday afternoon in Union Forum Hall that college is the perfect place to erase the racism tape that plays in their minds.

Comedy takes sociology further

Sociologist uses laughter as text in life's classroom

KIMIS TIMOTHEADIS
Contributing Writer

Bertrice Berry is not like any other comedienne.

A Ph.D. graduate in sociology and former university professor, Berry has decided to change people's minds about life by using humor.

"I decided humor is a wonderful way to reach and teach people," Berry said. "The comedy setting provides you with a larger audience, and you can get positive messages through."

Berry said she believes comedy takes sociology a step further.

"Sociologists look at the everyday things taken for granted, and they point them out for you," she said. "I want to go a step further."

Comedy helps sociology, and sociology helps comedy, Berry said.

Education has played a very important role in her life, and she said she believes in what education can do.

"Education is incredible and has changed my life. I became a middle-class person from a lower-working-class person with just an education," Berry said. "But the main thing education did to me was to teach me how to choose."

"Education, not a degree, taught me how to take information and apply it in ways to improve my own life," she said.

Berry said the main message she wants to teach people through her comedy shows is diversity.

"I want to tell people that we are all different, but we can share those differences. This way, we would learn from one another," she said. "Sharing would remove the idea of better or worse and can improve our lives."

"We would not compete but just be and want to share things," Berry said.

She said she also wants to teach people the ability to laugh.

"We should learn to laugh at more things and not take things so serious," she said.

For four and a half years, she taught sociology and statistics while doing comedy.

In the last two years, she has been doing comedy exclusively because she has decided it is what she wants to do for now.

"They (universities) have already offered me teaching positions, but I turned them down," she said.

She will take a two-week sabbatical from comedy to teach in Texas.

"I love teaching, but now this is the only thing that has been workable," she said.

Berry said she has given performances to many different kinds of audiences — once even in a prison.

"It was an incredible new experience to see some hardcore criminals sitting there and laugh and then see them cry," she said.

Arts and Sciences given $880,000

ANGELA KELLEY
Collegian Reporter

Two large monetary donations have recently been given to the College of Arts and Sciences.

The $630,000 Tim Havley Trust has been divided between Arts and Sciences departments. President Jon Wefald allocated each department $20,000, and the remaining $190,000 has been designated to the college office.

"Single gifts of this magnitude are unusual for a college of Arts and Sciences," said Peter Nicholls, arts and sciences dean. "In fact, through the Havley gift, the endowment in the college office was more than double."

The $250,000 Cortelyou-Rust Professorship was given by John H. Rust of Chicago. The money was not designated, meaning it can be used as the University desires. Wefald decided which college received the professorship.

An endowed professorship is defined as a certain sum of money given to a university, and accrued interest from the money is given to the professorship recipient.

"This chair going to the College of Arts and Sciences will be a reminder of the vital importance of the College of Arts and Sciences to Kansas State University," Wefald said.

Requirements for the endowed chair will be decided by Nicholls and a six-member faculty advisory committee.

The recipient of the professorship will receive a $12,500 salary supplement.

Berry uses humor to combat racism

Comedienne asks people to change everyday actions

CRAIG KREUTZER
Collegian Reporter

Comedienne Bertrice Berry used humor to address a not-so-humorous topic — racism.

Berry spoke to about 170 people Wednesday in K-State Union Forum Hall as part of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

She said humor is an effective way for her to convey her message to the audience.

"Humor is such a powerful emotion," Berry said. "When you touch a person's emotion while teaching them, they will hear your message and learn it better than if you just lecture to them."

Berry related her experiences as a victim of racism.

"When I was looking for an apartment, I had someone say to me, 'I'm not discriminating against you because you're black, it's because you're a woman.'"

"I said 'Well, thank you. It seems so much different.'"

Berry said one cause of racism is people's fear of anything different.

"We teach that different isn't different, but that different is bad," she said.

She said it's important to not be scared to try something new just because it's different.

"Experiencing different things won't hurt us, it will enrich us."

"If you've never been to a Jewish synagogue, then go," she said. "It doesn't make you less Christian, it makes you more human."

People need to experience as many different things as possible, she said. This will let them see some of the stereotypes they believe are false, and hopefully, force them to change their attitudes.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Vote Bill would increase poll stations along with accuracyVOTE!

Currently, election results are not representative of majority student body opinions.

The whole reason issues are brought up for a student vote is to find out what the student body as a whole thinks.

Low-voter turnout, regardless of the topic to be voted on, destroys the theory of representation.

There are cures for the problem. The most obvious being to vote. Who spends your money is important, so vote for student body president.

How Student Senate spends your money is important, so vote on referendums like the one which includes Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and Farrell Library additions.

A bill which would provide more polling locations was read for the first time at the Oct. 7 Student Senate meeting.

Previously polling has taken place only in the Union. Bill 91/52 would add Derby Food Center and Cardwell Hall to the list of polling locations.

Additional polling locations are not quick fixes to low voter turnout. But Bill 91/52 is a first step toward ensuring that student elections are more representative of the entire student body.

Eldercare grant is money well-spent

Old people belong in nursing homes. That used to sum up society's sentiment toward elderly Americans. But, fortunately, people are actively working to change that negative sentiment — namely elderly people themselves.

The elderly are living on their own longer. And now, thanks to the federal government, they are getting the funding to do it.

The Department of Aging received a $30,000 grant Monday to set up a Kansas Eldercare Volunteer Corps.

The grant doesn't finance additional nursing homes where elderly people are not encouraged to do things for themselves. The Volunteer Corps is about helping elderly Kansans remain independent as long as they can in their own homes. Volunteers drop by to help with difficult tasks and leave the elderly person to accomplish the easier ones.

It is inevitable that some people need to be placed in total-care nursing homes, but enabling the elderly person to remain partially on his own lets him continue to live with freedom and dignity.

Kansas hurts itself to help Mighty Miss.

Believe it or not, someone has decided that drought-stricken Kansas has too much water for its own good.

A board that governs water rights to the Mississippi River basin announced the "father of all waters" would be running a bit shallow this winter without a little help from its daughter rivers.

The question put before the board was which river would pay up. Options were bountiful.

The Arkansas River basin has been, and probably always will be, controlled by domineering Colorado. Heck, Colorado hasn't even let western Kansans see what the Ark river looked like with water in it since the 1960s. Why would they help Easterners float their boats?

In the Dakotas, two lakes sitting on the Missouri River were so large they could be seen from space, but they had already paid their water rights bill to the Mississippi states.

And then there was the Kaw, you know, that massive, raging tidal wave of a river. And luckily for the board, Kansas had not paid its yearly water-rights bill. It didn't have the water or the money to do so.

So, the Corps of Engineers has been ordered to open the flood gates at Tuttle Creek, Milford and Perry reservoirs for the entire month of October or pay $500,000.

Stuck between a drought and a fiscal crisis, Kansas surrendered its water.

Yeah, so Old Man River needed water. Well, it got it for the bargain-basement price of another year of assured water shortage in Kansas.

NEWS FLASH—Beer ads are NOT realistic*SHAWN BRUCE

Remember what you have seen, because everything lost returns to the circling winds.

Ancient Navajo wind chant
Why ask why?
Beer commercial circa 1991

So I'm sitting in my apartment the other day eating a box of Kentucky Fried Chicken wings and knocking down a few cold ones when I say to myself, "Shawn, it doesn't get any better than this."

Then I realized I was an idiot.

Of course, it could be better. Where was the band? Where was the treasure chest full of cash? And where, oh where, was the Swedish bikini team?

Suffice it to say, they never showed. So instead of brooding over their absence, I decided to write a column about beer commercials.

Don't get me wrong. I like beer. It's been my beverage of choice for five or six years now.

And, unfortunately, my belly shows it. I look like one of the people in a Nutra-System Weight Loss Center "before" advertisement. I can still wear the same size jeans I wore in high school. I just wear them around my knees. (Thanks to my dad for that tired old joke.)

Yes, I'm pretty much the epitome of American beer drinkers. I'm overweight, physically unimpressive, and I sweat a lot.

But to look at beer commercials, you would never know that. There are no overweight people on beer commercials — everyone's gorgeous. And, above all else, people in beer commercials never sweat.

This, of course, is related to the theory that sex sells as well as the theory that fat people aren't sexy. I guess this is pretty much true, though the makers of the movie "Let Me Tell You About Fat Chicks Part 3" might disagree.

Actually, Eastern European advertisers probably use sex to sell better than almost anyone. It seems they flash a picture of a naked woman on the TV screen for five or six seconds. Then, once they have everyone's attention, they run a commercial for heat and serve borscht or whatever the hell else they're trying to sell.

The most obvious question is, "What the hell does a naked woman have to do with borscht?" The answer is, "About as much as a woman in a swimsuit has to do with beer."

But why ask why?

Maybe beer companies should try to include normal people in their little fantasy world.

For instance, you could take a woman dressed in clothes that allow her to breathe and shoes that allow her to walk and surround her with Mel Gibson look-alikes.

Or, you could take a big, burly, hairy man (like Ed Skoog or myself) and dress him in a trunk swimsuit (as opposed to bikini). Then, surround him with attractive women who don't mind a little "table muscle."

Or, maybe — just maybe — beer commercials could concentrate on teaching people to use the product responsibly instead of selling the image that people who drink the beer have sex a lot.

Wouldn't it be great?

To AmericaStudent's journey long, interesting*MAHESH SENAGALA GUEST

Mahesh Senagala is a graduate student in architecture from Hyderabad, India.

In India

Twittering and chirping, sparrows, parrots and a host of other birds bring morning to the sky of sun and clouds. All the ghosts and demons disappear giving way to the huge green trees rising from the red-black soil.

After a tiresome climb of a hundred rugged, stone steps up the hill, I reach the tiny temple built of black granite stones chiseled with care and devotion. I take a deep breath of the fresh morning air as the ringing of the temple bells reverberates deeply in the hills, trees, long grasses, blue sky and hearts of the people.

The 80-year-old priest chants a few mantras and distributes the "best-towel" — a piece of banana, a betel leaf and a betel nut — to me and the little children thronging the narrow veranda of the temple.

The puja is complete as soon as we prostrate before Lord Ganesh's (a Hindu God with elephant's head) idol and recite a few slokas and stories from Indian mythology. The house, a tiled, wooden and stone construction, is decorated with all kinds of leaves and colored papers.

The "festival of lights" has barely begun. The day comes to life only after the sun sinks behind the high hills in the west.

Dressed in new and colorful clothes, people set off fireworks that fill the sky with sounds and vivid images and memories. It is "Divali," the festival of lights — one of the multitude of rituals celebrating life in a spectacular way.

The voyage

Yet another sultry and hot, tropical, sunny day. I take leave of my friends, relatives, the land and the sky, which bred me for 20-odd years.

As I embark the steps of the Boeing, I say to myself, "Two years, I hope, will pass in two moments. And I will be back."

There I was, in a hermetically sealed "flying chamber." It took off and flew. Over strange clouds, vast oceans and mighty mountains, more like the magic flying carpet of Aladdin.

In the United States

Prepared as I was, I looked curiously through the misty window of the airplane as it taxied to the terminal. As I neared the entrance, a cold, harsh and heavy draft of air struck my face. With a strange shiver, I tightened my coat buttons.

It was evening and the city was veiled in a gray blanket. I ran for the terminal as though some apparition was haunting me. Huh, strange world! What in blazes did that flying chamber do to me? Where am I?

In Manhattan

Not one, not two, but hundreds.

Hundreds of cars. Some buzzing, some dozing, some sleeping and some weeping. I suddenly came to my senses with a fear of getting lost in the infinite machines.

Snow! Oops, it took a little time to practice walking on the hard ice. Trees looked bereft of everything in their life, looking sadly into the low, grey sky.

The second day I left the house for a stroll. Then suddenly, I felt the first warmth in the otherwise frozen land — an anonymous passerby said, "Hi there!"

All along the way it was warm. If not for these people, the land would forever be frozen, I thought.

After 10 months of being "nowhere," only now have I started getting a feel of the place. It's no wonder. After two dozen years of living in a place as strong as India with its harsh sun, long monsoons, traditions, festivals and people, this was a feeling of emptiness and being nowhere. As the trees — weary of fighting the chill — started preparing themselves for hibernatic sleep, leaf-by-leaf, they paved the way for yet another winter.

Reclining before my third-floor apartment window takes me back to that first cold breeze striking my face. And along with that, the memories of all those times — colors and gaiety, sun and dust, Gods and people.

From the land of sun to the land of sunflowers, it was a long journey.

Shoes more than toe protectors, now fashion statements

EMILY JOHNSON
A&E Writer

It's gotta be the shoes. Shoes come in all sizes, shapes, textures and colors nowadays. They can also be the essential part of an outfit.

Shoes have become more than just an article of clothing — they have become a statement, and students on campus are displaying shoes in every walk of life.

But how do students decide what to look for when buying shoes? With prices today, the decision can be crucial.

"I probably look for style first," said Shari Tomlin, sophomore in elementary education. "I just try to look for different styles. I don't just get what everyone else is wearing."

But according to Mike Cottey, manager of Kinney Shoes in Manhattan Town Center, most students do look for what everyone else is wearing.

"What we sell here is greatly influenced by women's trends," Cottey said.

Women are not the only customers following trends — 38 percent of the store's sales are women's, 37 percent are men's.

"The college-town women do influence a lot of what we sell, because they are very fashionable," Cottey said.

Shoe sales also tend to follow a particular pattern. Most students wear Mariners or Keds for a comfortable white tennis shoe during the beginning of the school year. Although brands such as Bass and Keds have added a variety of colors to their shoe styles, white is still the consumer favorite.

Birkenstocks are new fad

EMILY JOHNSON
A&E Writer

They started out as a comfortable alternative for a sandal, but Birkenstocks have now become one of the most popular items on campus.

Olson's Shoe Repair in Aggieville has been selling these bulky and comfortable sandals from Germany since 1984. But Edwin Olson Sr. said sales have increased in the past two years.

"It seems like students are wearing or accepting them a lot more," Cottey said. "I would say the sales are quite a bit better as far as students go."

Chris Freberg, a sophomore in milling science, bought his Birkenstocks early this summer.

"I bought them because they are comfortable," he said. "I really don't care what they look like, they're just comfortable."

These sandals, made with a cork sole, are designed to shape the foot comfortably and form a mold for a personalized fit.

"The Germans have a little different concept on footwear than the Americans or designers," Olson said. "Birkenstocks have a more pronounced arch in them and foot features inside of the sandal."

Although Birkenstocks are considered practical shoes, they carry a very high price tag. Costing between $79 and $84, these sandals can be an expensive addition to a shoe collection. Olson said these sandals are worth the cost because of their durability. Even with their growing popularity, Birkenstock's prices have remained relatively the same.

Olson's Shoe Repair is one of three stores in Kansas that sell Birkenstocks. They are also one of the few authorized repair stations in the United States.

"A lot of people send their Birkenstocks to us to repair and put in little notes saying they have had them for ten years," Olson said. "They leave little notes saying 'please take care' or 'make them like new.' They don't want a new pair, they want their same ones with their personalized fit."

During the fall, the McGyver boot or ankle-length leather boot are popular. But for the snow, the duck-style boot is the hottest item in shoe stores.

Cottey said Kinney Shoes sold out of the Duck boots two days after the first snow last year. Because of this, Kinney's has tried to obtain additional boots for this year.

For dressier footwear, black is the No. 1 shoe color. This year's new styles include the "Cowboy Bootie," an ankle-length boot for men and women. Also coming back in style are thick heels on pumps and boots.

Cottey said styles can be influenced by a variety of things. For example, one of this year's boot styles has an Indian look inspired by the movie "Dances With Wolves."

Cottey said although these types of shoes are attractive, they efficient, successful

It's a special feeling for Chiefs' fans to see Kansas City tied for the lead in the AFC West.

Here are a few things to keep in mind while savoring the Chiefs' impressive 33-6 victory over the previously undefeated and high-flying Buffalo Bills:

■ One game doesn't make a season and every weekend brings on yet another hotly-contested battle. This Sunday is no exception as Dan Marino and the Dolphins come to Arrowhead sporting a passing attack more potent than the one the Chiefs saw last week.

■ Kansas City will surely spend a few quiet moments this week remembering Jan. 5, the date Miami ended the Chiefs' promising season with a gut-wrenching come-from-behind wildcard victory, 17-16.

The Chiefs now trail only Buffalo (5-1) and Houston (4-2) in the AFC. The Chiefs' win becomes even larger when considering that it draws all three into a tie in the loss column in games versus AFC opponents.

The current three-game winning streak provides reason for even more excitement than past Marty Schottenheimer-coached teams, which have tended to be slow out of the gate. In his first two seasons at the Chiefs' helm, Schottenheimer possessed a .500 record in the first six games of the year. Those two teams finished the seasons 13-6-1. That type of finish would make KC strong contenders for the AFC West title, something Kansas City hasn't experienced since 1971.

Kansas City holds a 2-0 record versus AFC West teams. They are the only West team without an intradivisional loss.

But it's entirely too early in the season to talk about playoff position and tie-breakers.

That is, unless you are interested in seeing the AFC finally win a Super Bowl again. In that case, it wouldn't be a bad idea to pull for Lamar Hunt's Chiefs to make their long-awaited return to the Super Bowl.

Kansas City is the only AFC team that possesses the winning ingredients. The Chiefs are built around a power running game and hard-nosed defense. That's not ground-breaking news, but it could prove to be an immense advantage come January.

The running attack of Christian Okoye, Barry Word and Harvey Williams throws a scare into all opponents and have sent more than one macho linebacker home shaking his head. Kansas City's power game has had success in big games with those NFC teams and the Super Bowl should fit in well to that category.

Even with all of the changes the game has seen in recent years, it still takes smash-mouth gridiron ball to win the big games against the NFC's best. Washington, the New York Giants, San Francisco and Chicago all play power football, and the wide-open offenses of the AFC just can't measure up head-to-head, as the NFC has won seven straight.

John Elway's scrambles had three chances and have losses of 19, 32 and 45 points to show for it. Buffalo came close last season, before falling by a point. The run-and-shoot offense of Houston, in all likelihood, is not the answer either.

Not that the AFC can't win against the power game. It's just that by spreading the field, they really put themselves into a hole against talented teams — holes that more often than not prove too deep to overcome in big games.

Although wide-open offenses may be more exciting, they seldom lead to success.

Besides, watching the Chiefs in January could prove exciting enough.

McKee battles to keep playingSpiker overcomes leg problems to regain roleFRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

Her teammates might be afraid when they see a spider or a snake. They could get a bad feeling in the pit of their stomach when Nebraska's Janet Kruse, 1990 Big Eight player of the year, rises up for a spike.

But for Angie McKee, middle blocker on the K-State volleyball team, it's truly frightening when a teammate twists an ankle.

"If that happens, my eyes get big, and it takes my breath away," McKee said.

McKee, a native of Goodland, knows what she is talking about. McKee had to redshirt the 1990 season after suffering a broken leg in a game against Wichita State during a spring tournament in Kansas City on March 31, 1990.

She still remembers clearly the day when bad luck hit.

"I wanted to hit a ball and jumped up," she said. "When I came down to the floor again, I landed wrong. It just broke both (shin and fibula) bones."

McKee, who has had a rod in her right leg since the injury, said she felt it was more than a poor April Fools' Day joke.

"I didn't think that I could come back again," she said. "I was really worried (about her career)."

After the cast was removed, McKee started a rehabilitation program to strengthen her leg muscles. "It was amazing how fast my leg shrunk after only three weeks".

She said the program was hard, and that trainers pushed to get her fit as fast as possible.

But as Christmas approached, McKee's rehabilitation course took a not-so-friendly turn.

"I had a stress fracture, and I had to start all over again from day one," she said. "I was really close to giving up then. I was asking myself 'Why I am doing all that?' I could just go on to get my education done.

"But then I realized that I couldn't do it without volleyball. And I didn't want to let my friends (on the team) down."

The support offered by her mother and teammate Kathy Saxton were two major reasons McKee decided to stick it out.

Her mother, Linda, came to Manhattan to help her out in many ways.

"My mom went to a study review session for me," McKee said. "She went to a couple of classes for me to take notes. She gave me a lot of support."

"After my mom went home, I felt (I was) leaning toward Kathy more than to anybody else," she said. "Kathy talked to me a lot. She gave me support to hang in and to work hard to come back on the team."

McKee believed in Saxton's words and started to work out again. While the team was practicing on the court, McKee was on the sideline and practiced on her own.

With foot coordination training and jump training, she was hoping to get back on the court as soon as possible.

McKee finally made it.

"The moment I stepped on the court with the other players felt good," she said. "I thought I was out long enough, and I couldn't wait any longer."

The team welcomed her, but McKee felt team members treated her differently, because they weren't sure how she could do with her leg. She had just started to gain a little confidence when the next problem surfaced — a new coach.

Again, Saxton convinced her to stay around. But McKee also gives credit to the coach.

"I was worried about the change," she said. "I didn't know how to deal with that. I was tempted to quit then, too, because I didn't know what Patti (Hagemeyer) was going to offer."

"I'm glad I stuck around. She Montana out for season

By the Associated Press

SANTA CLARA, Calif. — Joe Montana, the three-time Super Bowl MVP who has been sidelined since training camp, finally consented to undergo elbow surgery Wednesday night.

After two days of crisscrossing the country hoping to find an alternative, Montana, 35, has decided that surgery is the best option to repair the torn tendon in his right elbow that has kept him off the playing field.

"Joe personally visited at least two other physicians, besides MRIs, where he was physically examined, and it was Joe's decision after receiving (team physician) Dr. Dillingham's, his team's input as well as the other physicians he visited, that it was no longer necessary for him to go elsewhere," 49ers president Carmen Policy said during a hastily arranged news conference Wednesday at team headquarters.

"... Ultimately it was Joe's decision to go ahead and do what he is going to do this evening."

The surgery, which is described as having an 80-percent rate of success, will be similar to the operation that ended the career of former Pittsburgh Steelers quarterback Terry Bradshaw. He was 35, too.

The procedure is expected to take 45 minutes, and Montana is scheduled to be released Thursday afternoon.

"There is no suggestion at this point in time that there is any damage to the ligaments," Policy said. "This is a tendon situation. ... It is nothing more than (Dr. Dillingham) anticipated the problem to be a month or so ago."

Volleyball team loses to Jayhawks

It was a typical battle between the University of Kansas and K-State: close and down to the wire.

But the Wildcat volleyball team's recent conference woes continued Wednesday night, as the Jayhawks handed the Wildcats a five-game defeat in Lawrence.

Kansas won the first, third and final games of the match, which contained two 17-15 single-game scores.

The final count: 15-8, 13-15, 17-15, 15-17, 15-10 in favor of the home-standing Hawks.

Kris Kleinschmidt led KU with 23 kills and had a .263 attack percentage. Kathy Saxton had 22 kills for K-State.

KU is now 18-3 on the season, while K-State fell to 6-12.

Brewers show Trebelhorn door

MILWAUKEE (AP) — The Milwaukee Brewers today fired manager Tom Trebelhorn a day after Sal Bando took over as general manager.

Trebelhorn, the Brewers' manager for five years, was rumored to be in trouble since the Brewers fell to 43-60 on Aug. 3 and out of the AL East pennant race. The team, however, won 40 of its last 59 games to finish fourth at 83-79.

Bando was named senior vice president of baseball operations Tuesday, replacing longtime general manager Harry Dalton, who was reassigned.

Coach does kicker favor

KU's Eichloff talked into playing in high schoolBILL LANG
Contributing Writer

At 6-foot-1, 215 pounds, Dan Eichloff looks more like a linebacker.

But to everybody in the Big Eight Conference, he's probably the best place kicker and punter this league has seen in some time.

Last year, as a freshman at KU, Eichloff earned UPI honors as the newcomer of the year, honorable mention as a place kicker and first-team recognition as a punter.

But this nightmare to Jayhawk opponents almost did not occur.

When Eichloff was a junior at Northeast High School in Fort Lauderdale, Fla., he was forced to go out for football by his coach. Eichloff said if he didn't, he would have received a failing grade in his weightlifting class.

"I didn't know what to do at the time, so I went out for the team," Eichloff said. "I know now that I probably should have talked to someone about it, but I haven't had any regrets since then."

K-State fans who attended last year's contest in Lawrence regretted seeing Eichloff split the uprights with the deciding points on a KU school-record 58-yard field goal, as the Hawks won 27-24.

Eichloff was unsure whether that bomb would make it through.

"I didn't think I hit it that good when my foot hit it," he said. "But it just kept going on down the field and eventually through the uprights."

"After it went through ... I just started jumping up and down all over the place."

A kicking match with KU spells doom for most teams. Not only does Eichloff possess leg strength, but he hits the uprights with accuracy.

Entering Saturday's Sunflower Series matchup, Eichloff has connected on 11 of 12 extra points and seven of eight field goals.

In punting, Eichloff, who is second in the nation in punting, is averaging 46 yards per boot — good enough to eclipse former Big Eight standout Bucky Scribner's record of 45.8.

For Eichloff, who moved to the United States from Germany in 1984, a lot of the publicity he receives is difficult to handle.

"I'm just one part of a team," Eichloff said. "I line up with 10 other guys and they make me look good."

K-State football coach Bill Snyder said Eichloff has the chance to be a factor in Saturday's game, much the same way he was last year.

"He just can't be overlooked," Snyder said. "He kicked a 58-yarder last year that was the difference. He makes a tremendous difference in the game. He can either nail the long field goal or pin you deep in your corner. We have a lot of concern and respect for him."

Eichloff said his experience as a soccer player aided him in developing his kicking skills.

"I know the sweet spot on the ball and playing goalie has helped me transfer those kicking skills over to the football field," he said.

Eichloff said he does most of his workouts during the hot summer months in Florida where he spends up to five hours per day kicking field goals and punting at his old high school.

"I'm just trying to get the correct form and do the right things in kicking a field goal or punt," he said.

The off-season work has allowed Eichloff to worry less about his on-field performance during football transfer those kicking skills over to the football field," he said.

Eichloff said he does most of his workouts during the hot summer months in Florida where he spends up to five hours per day kicking field goals and punting at his old high school.

"I'm just trying to get the correct form and do the right things in kicking a field goal or punt," he said.

The off-season work has allowed Eichloff to worry less about his on-field performance during football season.

"I feel by that time I should have done everything possible to do kicks correctly," Eichloff said. "The rest is just staying in shape and relying on my confidence."

"I know what I have to do, but it's just kicking a ball and that's all. It's no big deal."

And if he receives the chance to clinch the game for the Jayhawks this year?

"I'll be ready to kick it through the uprights," Eichloff said.

Jays, Pirates post wins

Solid pitching by rookie helps Toronto even series

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Rookie Juan Guzman pitched 5½ strong innings as the Toronto Blue Jays beat the Minnesota Twins 5-2 Wednesday to even the best-of-7 series at one game apiece.

The loss broke the Twins' seven-game postseason winning streak in their high-decibel dome.

After a day off, the series shifts to Toronto for Game 3 on Friday night. Scott Erickson (20-8) is scheduled to pitch for the Twins against left-hander Jimmy Key (16-12).

"I hope we don't have to come back here," Toronto manager Cito Gaston said. "This is a tough place to win."

The last time the Twins lost a postseason home game was in 1970, when they played at Metropolitan Stadium.

Coming into Game 1 of the playoffs, the Blue Jays had won 10 of 12 games in the Metrodome and 12 of 18 overall against the Twins. Minnesota was trying to tie the record for consecutive postseason victories at home set by the New York Yankees (1927-36).

"Guzman pitched a fabulous game," Twins manager Tom Kelly said.

Drabek pulls hamstring,
Van Slyke leads offense

By the Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Forget the tomahawks. Pittsburgh chopped the Atlanta Braves down to size.

But don't break out the champagne for the Pirates, either. They won Game 1 of the NL playoffs, 5-1 Wednesday night, but lost ace Doug Drabek, for now.

Drabek pitched like a playoff pro for six innings, shutting down Atlanta on three hits. Then, when he tried to stretch an RBI double into a triple, he suddenly strained his left hamstring and was forced to leave.

The shaky Pirates bullpen was able to hold off the Braves this time. Whether it will get another chance to save Drabek is uncertain, pending a further examination Thursday.

At least the Pirates got one good game out of Drabek. That's more than Atlanta got from 20-game winner Tom Glavine as the Braves lost for the 10th consecutive time in postseason play.

Andy Van Slyke rattled Glavine with a home run in the first inning.

And within four innings, it was 3-0 and the worst-to-first Braves had gone back to worst again.

Rest of Columbus' story to be examined

Professor to address effects on native cultures

DARLA GOODMAN
Staff Writer

The story of the discovery of America is not as simple as "In 1492, Columbus sailed the ocean blue." And, on the eve of next year's 500th anniversary of the European discovery by Christopher Columbus of the Western Hemisphere, some are trying to tell the rest of the story.

Harald Prins, assistant professor of anthropology, will present "Christopher Columbus: Contested Hero — Alternative Views of Discovery, Exploration and Native Identity" at 7:30 p.m. Friday at the Ecumenical Campus Ministry, 1021 Denison Ave.

He said he will speculate on the 500th anniversary and how Columbus has come to be seen as both a saint and a villain.

He will address the effect the discovery had on the lives of three groups: the natives of the new land, the European colonists and the Africans who were brought here as a work force, he said.

"The exploration means three totally different things to three groups of people," he said. "The struggle for cultural survival for native people today has an impact that reverberates through every native society."

Prins said he brings an outsider's view to the issue since he comes from the Netherlands. He has done field work in South America and worked as a tribal anthropologist on the Canadian and New England border. One of his interests is in ethnohistory.

The speech, sponsored by the Manhattan Alliance on Central America, the Latin American Studies Program and the Latin American Students Organization, is the first in a series of five lectures scheduled through November.

"The focus of the series is to give visibility to the Latin American Studies Program on the eve of the 500th anniversary of Columbus' discovering America," said Marcial Riquelme, associate professor of sociology and head of the Latin American Studies Program.

The series, organized by the Latin American Studies Program and the Latin American Studies Organization, will demonstrate the interrelationship of the two parts of the Western Hemisphere, he said.

The presentations will show how the problems of the hemisphere are all related, including health, drugs, the environment and politics, he said.

LASO is a new student organization forming to communicate and reflect Latin American values and culture at K-State, said Eduardo Arce-Diaz, graduate student in agricultural economics.

The group plans to be involved in a variety of activities to prepare the campus for the celebration of the 500th anniversary of Europe's discovery of the American continents, Arce-Diaz said.

LASO will meet at 7:30 p.m. Thursday in Holton 3.

Housing design lauded

Strong Complex architects win AIA excellence award

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

Despite budget limitations and time constraints, the joint-venture team of Black & Veatch Architects and Ron Reid Associates won an award of excellence last month for their design of Strong Complex.

The award was given in Manhattan at the American Institute of Architects Kansas Conference on Design and was based on the architects' sensitivity to the existing Putnam and Boyd buildings and the design of the tunnels joining them.

"We tried to respect the buildings that were already there," said Ron Reid, owner of the Manhattan firm. "We didn't want it to look like an addition, but rather like something that was originally built that way."

Reid said they designed the tunnel so the south wall would be exposed to sunlight and prevent students from feeling like they are walking through a dark tunnel to get from building to building.

The architects used the same material, Cottonwood Limestone, throughout the entire addition, which also scored points with the judges.

They also renovated Van Zile Hall, which includes a 530-seat dining area, private and semi-private suites that share baths, a convenience store, TV rooms, recreation rooms and computer rooms.

These features benefit Boyd and Putnam residents as well as Van Zile residents.

Wayne Holle, junior in computer engineering, lived in Putnam last year. He said the construction resident at Boyd Hall, said she was satisfied with the results of the vote.

"It just makes it easier, because sometimes it gets pretty loud in here, and this way visitors will be out of the hall earlier," she said.

Several weeks ago, West Hall voted to change to 24-hour visitation. Some West residents have met in protest of the new policy, and a re-vote will be taken near the end of the semester, said Rita Hosie, West Hall president.

Ford Hall residents will not be voting on changing their visitation policy, said Michael Wiersma, assistant hall director.

Brian Kerschen, freshman in pre-law, prepares to drive a fraternity brother safely home from a recent Saturday night party. Kerschen donated one night to make sure his brothers made it home safe in the Brothers Against Drunk Driving Pike Express. The Pi Kaps are the first greek organization to have a system for keeping their members from driving drunk.

Brothers Helping Brothers

The members of the Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity paved the way to eliminating drunk driving.

It's Saturday night. Pi Kappa Alpha fraternity pledges Brian Kerschen, freshman in pre-law, and Brian Carosone, freshman in architectural engineering, sit in the lobby at the Pi Kap house drinking and waiting.

Drinking soda, that is, and waiting for the phone to ring. For these and other Pi Kap pledges who volunteer their time to the fraternity's Brothers Against Drunk Driving program, helping their brothers is worth the wait.

During date dashes and weekends, two pledges don "BADD Pi Kap EXPRESS" T-shirts and become designated drivers for four hours.

Pi Kap Matt Lashley, freshman in sociology, said the waiting is beside the point. The fulfillment is in helping his brothers.

"It's something to be proud of — getting my brothers home safely," he said. "They feel real thankful, and they know they can depend on us."

Pi Kap Brad Tyler, freshman in business, and his partner made a total of 16 trips to and from a date dash Sept. 11.

Tyler said his reason for driving was to make sure people didn't drive drunk.

Dave Williams, junior in advertising, said the goal of the BADD program is to get fraternity brothers home alive and without DUIs.

When Williams was elected pledge educator, he set out to implement the original ideas of Doug Claussen, junior in business and previous pledge educator, and focus the program on drinking and driving within the fraternity house.

Renee Sandstrom, senior in marketing and member of Pi Beta Phi sorority, saw the Pi Kap designated drivers in action during a date dash.

"The Pi Kaps are setting a good example by having the program," she said. "It is a positive step in decreasing drunk driving."

Sigma Alpha Epsilon fraternity sponsors a program similar to the Pi Kaps'. Two SAE pledges are designated drivers from 9 p.m. to 2 a.m. Thursday through Saturday.

SAE President Nick Weigel, senior in bakery science and management, said the focus of the program is to make sure someone too drunk to drive calls for a ride.

The idea of brothers helping brothers with designated driver programs is contagious.

Lashley said people in other fraternities hear about BADD and want to get involved in similar programs.

"I've told friends in other fraternities what we are doing, and they say, 'Hey, that's neat. Maybe we can start something like that.'"

Kerschen receives an address from a brother ready to go home. Those on call at the house spend a great deal of time waiting.

Brian Carosone (ABOVE), freshman in architectural engineering and design, sits in the lobby of the Pi Kap House waiting for the phone to ring. Pi Kap pledges volunteer to serve shifts from 10:30 p.m. to 2:30 a.m. to ensure members make it home safe when they have been drinking. Scott Greene, junior in business administration, (LEFT) opens the door as Brad Tyler, freshman in business administration, follows him into the Pi Kap house after being delivered by the express from a party.

Decision to attend grad school a challenge

Further education demands excellent grades, more money

VALERIE HEARON
Collegian Reporter

Many students face the decision of whether or not to continue their education and go to graduate school. For many, the decision is based upon several factors. For example, grades, finances and career opportunities can help determine the decision.

The first step is actually making the decision to go to Graduate School. After that, the classic way to begin is to contact the department and meet with the faculty. Then, an intricate process of matching students and faculty begins, said Brad Fenwick, associate professor of pathology and infectious disease and associate dean of the Graduate School.

The student should then fill out an application which includes previous degrees, a recommendation letter and what the student's aspirations are. All of this information goes together, Fenwick said.

There are many factors, however, that go into being accepted for graduate school — the obvious being grade point average.

"It varies a great deal between individuals and the departments. There's a lot of leeway there. Graduate School is challenging and "A graduate student can be dismissed from the program for not sustaining a 3.0 GPA."

grades are demanding," Fenwick said. "A graduate student can be dismissed from the program for not sustaining a 3.0 GPA."

Graduate school is also more expensive than the undergraduate program. For a resident, the fees for an undergraduate is $44 per credit hour, and for a graduate student the fees are $56 per credit hour.

There are more than 3,200 graduate students at the University. Among those, there are 534 graduate teaching assistants and 463 graduate research assistants. The tuition is waived for GTAs, but they do pay campus privilege fees. For GRA's, the tuition is not waived. There are also 59 graduate assistants and several others who are here on fellowships.

Sallie Brown, graduate student in sports psychology, said the hardest part of graduate school is writing the letters and getting the responses back, and then having to choose which college best fits your needs.

"Start early putting out your applications and try to do a lot of research into the program. Most of all, try to find a good adviser to assist you," Brown said.

Students who are interested in going to Graduate School should be applying now. Now is the time to do it, Fenwick said.

HALO to visit Chicago

K-Staters attracted to National Hispanic Leadership Conference

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Twenty-eight members of K-State's Hispanic American Leadership Organization will have a chance to connect with other Hispanic students and professionals in Chicago this weekend.

The Ninth Annual United States Hispanic Leadership Conference is the largest conference of its kind in the country. More than 2,500 people are expected to attend.

Highlights include keynote speakers Miriam Santos, treasurer of the City of Chicago and Henry Cisneros, former mayor of San Antonio, Texas.

The career fair will give students a chance to make contact with prospective employers.

"I encourage members to have their resumes ready and to take them with them because I've met some good people there," said HALO President Melissa Garcia, junior in journalism and mass communications.

Garcia said attending the conference last year raised her awareness of problems facing Hispanics today and gave her some ideas about what she could do to make a difference.

"When I came back, I felt like there are so many things facing Hispanics today that I don't know about — and I'm an active member of an Hispanic organization."

She said the workshop gave her a chance to meet other student leaders and find out how their groups are organized and funded. Garcia said she is still in touch with some of these students and is working with them to plan a regional conference scheduled for March in Kansas City.

At this year's conference, there will be special meetings on specific issues including a women's political forum, a Hispanic labor forum and a meeting on the Hispanic agenda.

HALO Adviser Anita Cortez said the conference is an excellent opportunity for students to meet some very successful Hispanics and make professional contacts but that the students who will be attending are inter-

"These students have a strong sense of commitment to the Hispanic community. They will meet with other students around the country who care about the quality of education and the quality of life for other Hispanics," Cortez said.

HALO raised money for the trip by sponsoring a dance at which they raised about $400. The group also received a $2,500 subsidy from a multicultural travel fund set aside by the Division of Institutional Advancement.

Garcia said she hopes the total cost to the student will end up being somewhere between $45 and $50.

the number rose to 1,899, said Robin Eversole, director of university relations at KU.

"We experienced an increase of 8.7 percent," she said.

Although the decrease in student numbers at K-State is slight, Taylor-Archer said the figures show the University is not advancing in the area of diversity.

"From my own perspective, I would like for K-State to double its percentage of minorities to 12 percent of the student population," she said.

She hopes the percentage of minority enrollment will increase automatically in the next few years because of demographic changes in the United States, Taylor-Archer said.

But Taylor-Archer is concerned many minorities don't return to complete their degrees at K-State. Currently, there are no statistics on how many minorities finish here. She said it's something she wants to start researching.

"My concern is with the retention of minority students that enroll here and whether the cultural and academic supports are in place for these students to complete degree requirements," Taylor-Archer said. "I need to do a further analysis, but right now I'm looking at it to see if these students are new and how many of them do not return."

One solution to keeping retention rates high would be to have more faculty of color, she said. Not only would students of color benefit from cultural similarities, but the entire student population would get a clearer understanding of minorities, she said.

K-State over the last few years has developed recruitment as well as multicultural awareness programs such as Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, to conduct an environment sensitive to the needs of minority students, she said.

The effort to produce these programs is part of President Jon Weisfeld's enrollment management program that went into effect in 1986, said Pat Bosco, associate vice president for institutional advancement and dean of student life.

The program gives specific attention to targeted groups, such as students of color, he said.

"We have a systematic plan to recruit all students but we have a full-court press we put on for minority students," Bosco said.

Part of the recruitment plan is to travel out of state, send out mailings and explain financial-aid opportunities, he said.

The importance of the recruiting is for K-State to communicate a comfortable attitude that can be both challenging and sensitive to minorities, Bosco said.

"It's very important to our state, even our country, that our student body be representative, and to let everyone know what the opportunities and the benefits of a college education are," he said. "As a land-grant university, our mission is to serve everyone."

FDA approves AIDS drug

Scientists angered by quick decision to allow controversial DDI distribution

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Food and Drug Administration approved a second AIDS-fighting drug Wednesday despite lingering questions about its safety and effectiveness.

AIDS

AIDS activists hailed the approval of didanosine, or DDI, as a milestone in the effort to get new drugs from the laboratory to patients. But some scientists said the FDA has set a dangerous precedent in its drug-approval process.

The approval was based on less scientific data than normally required, but FDA Commissioner David Kessler said that had to be balanced against the needs of dying AIDS patients.

"It is the victims of this dreaded disease who are uppermost on our minds," Kessler said at a news conference.

DDI was approved to treat AIDS patients who don't respond to or can't tolerate AZT, the only other fully approved anti-AIDS drug. Both drugs act similarly to slow progression of AIDS, but neither cures the disease and each can have serious side effects.

"There are still many unanswered questions," said Dr. Anthony Fauci, head of the National Institute on Allergy and Infectious Diseases, adding that studies testing DDI's long-term safety and effectiveness were continuing.

The drug was developed by the National Cancer Institute and has been licensed to Bristol-Myers Squibb Co., which will market it as Videx. Bristol-Myers said it had two programs to help people with limited resources get the drug.

The AIDS Action Council said the FDA had "sensitively balanced a strict scientific standard against the needs of people with no treatments for a life-threatening illness."

Dr. Deborah Cotton, a researcher at Boston's Beth Israel Hospital and a member of the FDA's advisory committee that recommended approval of DDI in July, said the benefit of making the drug available "is not balanced by the real loss we've created in credibility by peering into clinical trials not yet concluded."

In clinical trials where DDI was tested on AIDS patients who didn't respond to or could not take AZT, DDI was shown to increase the number of white blood cells, called CD-4 cells. Those cells have been shown to be important to immune system function, which is weakened by AIDS.

The DDI approval was noteworthy, too, because it applies to adults as well as children, Kessler said. In the past, the FDA has usually approved drugs for adults before allowing their use in children.

Canadian officials announced its approval of DDI Wednesday, after the first joint review of a drug by the FDA and Canada's Health Protection Branch.

The FDA based its decision on themselves to the audience. "The slang for it would be, 'How they sell it,'" he said. "Do they finish the motions?"

"It's hard to put into words, but a lot has to do with the shoulders, head, hips, legs and high kicks — just a professional-looking dance."

Henderson said she thinks the judges should follow some type of point system when choosing cheerleaders.

"He told me, face to face, if the judges would have gone by scores, four totally different girls would have been picked," she said.

Not all judges finished completing point-score worksheets, Johnson said, and points are only used to help the judges remember how the person did.

"It is their prerogative to use points if they feel points are necessary," Johnson said.

Henderson said she would like to see some type of written criteria on how cheerleaders are judged.

"I am a small person, and my body is not going to change any more," she said. "If it's not the size of my body — what is it?"

"I'd like to know exactly how they judge."

Johnson said the way Henderson projected herself was not as mature as the other people trying out.

"Her routine did not look like a college cheerleader, therefore, she did not look as mature as the people she was competing against."

"There are other girls who have a perfect body who also would not project a collegiate look," he said. "The difference is she is young and has plenty of time to improve."

One girl who auditioned at least three times in the past but was not picked deserved to be chosen, Henderson said.

"She was by far the best," she said. Johnson said that particular girl could not do the stunts as well, and it would have been hard to place her with a partner.

A K-State cheerleader has to be someone who catches the eyes of the audience, he said.

"A lot of times, your focus goes to one girl because she's grabbing your attention," he said. "You just can't help but look at them. That little bit of extra technique and projection makes people want to watch them."

Henderson retained an attorney Tuesday and was advised not to talk further about the situation.

Her attorney, Keith Henry of Junction City, declined to comment on the matter.

University Attorney Richard Seaton said a sexual discrimination statute probably wouldn't be involved in this case, but it may be something he will look into.

Lines of bicycles are inspected by prospective buyers Wednesday afternoon before an auction at East Stadium. The bikes were recovered by K-State police and held for six months prior to the auction.

TODD FEEBACK/Collegian

McKee

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 6 helped me a lot. She gave me a lot of confidence. She told me when I did something wrong, if I came too late to the ball, and stuff like that."

Hagemeyer was glad McKee stayed.

"My first impression of Angie was that she was not very confident in her athletic and volleyball ability," Hagemeyer said. "I knew she was a good person because she worked very hard in the gym. She wanted to be good."

When the spring semester came to its end, McKee knew she was the last in line within the team. What followed was maybe the hardest summer McKee ever had.

"I worked out a lot like crazy," she said. "I ran, I swam, I lifted weights, I did aerobics. I did everything to get back in a good shape."

The summer work paid off. McKee was ready to get back where she was before the accident — in the starting lineup.

"Angie made a commitment to the volleyball program," Hagemeyer said. "She came back in excellent condition. She walked in here in the best shape I think she has ever been in. And she walked in very confident in what she could do."

Hagemeyer said she is extremely proud of what McKee did this summer because not every Division I athlete makes that commitment.

To Hagemeyer, McKee is an important key for the team.

"I think she's a very valuable team player," Hagemeyer said. "The team likes Angie. They like to play with her. For some players on the team, she could be a role model that hard work does pay off."

"She does play a leadership role on our team. Against Iowa State, she was able to hit against two blockers, and when we needed the ball back, she got it for us. I think she's a good person to build the K-State volleyball program around."

early findings of clinical trials involving more than 2,500 AIDS patients and an expanded access program that made the drug available to more than 22,000 people at no charge.

Bristol-Myers said it will help people with limited resources get DDI either through insurance or Medicaid coverage, or by providing it at no cost to those who have no third-party coverage.

The government's licensing agreement requires Bristol-Myers to charge a "reasonable price" for the drug.

Award

"We have a closer relationship with Boyd than we did before," Holle said. "We do more events together, such as dances and parties."

"We also have air-conditioning this year," he said. "That was certainly worth waiting for."

Kevin Greischar, a K-State graduate now working at Black & Veatch in Kansas City, is one of the architects who worked on the project. Greischar said a primary concern of the architects was traffic patterns of students.

"We kept links between the buildings so that students wouldn't have to walk different ways than they did before," Greischar said. "We were definitely looking for an unobtrusive design."

The architects were under a strict deadline to complete a design that would meet the requirements of the housing committee and administration.

"They wanted something that would provide an alternative living environment for the students," Greischar said. "Van Zile was to be perceived as a quality place that caters to seniors and graduate students."

Van Zile Hall was originally built in 1926 to house female students. It closed in 1984 and was left abandoned after a decrease in student housing demand. The idea to renovate Van Zile and connect it with Boyd and Putnam was proposed in summer 1989.

Shoes

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 5 are "scary" to sell in a college town. Because shoes are so trendy, students usually want to follow the practical styles.

Also gaining popularity on campus are the Urban Hikers for hiking and walking. Although these shoes were originally made for hiking, students looking for a rugged look and a comfortable, sturdy shoe are wearing them.

For tennis shoes, cross trainers are most popular among students, said Michelle Poulin, sales clerk at Ballard's in Aggieville. Because of their versatility, the demand for cross trainers has increased during the past three years.

Students looking for a more stylish tennis shoe are wearing K-Swiss court shoes.

"Students like them (K-Swiss) because of their durability, and they make a nice white tennis shoe," Brian Peak, Ballard's sales clerk, said.

For the traditionalists, Converse

All Stars remain popular. With high or low tops, Chuck Taylor's have not changed in style — only in price.

Cottey said it is amusing to see the students come in. They usually know what they want, and Cottey said it's his responsibility to accommodate the students.

"These kids are not stupid," Cottey said. "They know what they want, and that's usually what everyone else is wearing."

Police to prevent Aggieville violence

By the Collegian Staff

Boosted police forces and security fences are part of the plan to prevent violence in Aggieville after the K-State-KU football game Saturday.

Traditionally, Aggieville has been a prime party spot following a K-State victory over KU, increasing the instances of vandalism and underage drinking.

Following the 1986 Aggieville riot, the Riley County Police Department has taken steps to prevent damage to Aggieville businesses.

"We aren't anticipating any problems, but there are precautions being taken," said Dan Walter, Aggieville Business Association president.

During halftime, a 4-foot snow fence will be set up around the Aggieville area to restrict pedestrian entry into core areas.

"This is being done primarily to check for containers of alcohol and beer," RCPD Director Alvan Johnson said.

Campus police from K-State and KU, along with Troop C of the Kansas Highway Patrol, will assist the RCPD.

"We don't expect any problems. But any time you have that many people in that small of an area, all you need is a catalyst to have trouble," KHP Troop Commander Alvie Furbeck said.

Walter said, "We just want to make sure everyone has a safe and enjoyable time."

A recently passed city ordinance against open containers on sidewalks and streets will also be enforced in an effort to curb violent confrontations and vandalism.

"With the new drinking laws, a majority of the campus can't drink in Aggieville," Walter said. "Wherever there is excessive use of alcohol, there is liable to be problems, and that's as true in Aggieville as it is anywhere else in the country."

Walter said that in the past, thrown beverage containers cause the most broken windows.

"The ordinance preventing containers on sidewalks and streets will hopefully prevent this," Walter said. "There will also be no cars allowed in

New witness speaks out

Thomas asked her breast size, capable of doing what Hill charges, past employee says

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A former colleague at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission surfaced Thursday as a second witness in the sexual harassment hearings involving Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas. She said Thomas once made unwelcome advances and asked her breast size.

Angela Wright, a former EEOC spokeswoman and now a newspaper editor at the Charlotte (N.C.) Observer, told the newspaper, "I feel in my gut" that Anita Hill was telling the truth in making the original sexual harassment allegations against Thomas.

"I know enough about the man to know he's quite capable of doing what she said he did," Wright said.

The White House first revealed the existence of a second witness set to appear at Thomas' sexual harassment hearings before the Senate Judiciary Committee set to get under way Friday.

Word that Wright had been subpoenaed to testify came as senators were huddled behind closed doors debating the ground rules of the dramatic, nationally televised hearings.

Even before the Charlotte newspaper was published, Republican Senate supporters of Thomas sought to downplay the significance of her testimony.

Second Thomas accuser appears

- A former colleague of Thomas is not claiming harassment, but came forward to back up Anita Hill's story.
- Most major national TV and radio networks are planning to air the confirmation hearings live today at 9 a.m.

Wright told the Observer she was "not stating a claim of sexual harassment against Clarence Thomas."

"It's not something that intimidated or frightened me. At the most, it was annoying and obnoxious," she said.

"My desire here is not to keep Clarence Thomas off the Supreme Court ... But I'm knowledgeable of circumstances where Clarence Thomas was out of line and said things that were inappropriate. So, I believe Anita Hill. ... I'm saying I think this woman is credible and this is why I think she's credible."

The Senate was ready to vote on Thomas' nomination on Tuesday, with the White House expressing confidence, when a furor developed over Hill's allegations, jeopardizing his nomination.

Thomas asked for a postponement

Jardine renovation strains budget

Extra amenities questioned; other units need attention

VICTORIA CHERRIE

Renovation at Jardine Terrace Apartments has raised questions about the extent of some renovations and the new qualifications for residency.

Building F was renamed William's Place and refurbished for the purpose of providing housing for graduate, unmarried and non-traditional students. Faculty members are also allowed to have a one-year lease.

The estimated cost for William's Place was $250,000.

Normal Jardine renovations cost about $100,000, and another $100,000 is a fixed cost used for la-

The Building F renovation project, however, was allocated $50,000 extra for the addition of special amenities. The amenities added include window air-conditioning units, wooden cabinets, dishwashers, microwaves and new carpeting.

The additions and the intensity of renovations have caused some to question the move since there are apartments in Jardine that haven't yet been included in the renovation process and others that have been re-

Students victims of scam

Companies promise aid, steal money

JEFF PILAND
Collegian Reporter

Although paying for a college education can be hard, students should be aware of easy-money promises made by companies offering scholarship search services.

These companies often charge from $50 to $300 for their services. "A lot of times, what happens is the information that comes back from scholarship search companies is information about federal aid programs, which you could walk into this office and get for free," said Larry Moeder, director of student financial assistance.

The Student Financial Assistance office also has a scholarship search service that locates sources other than the federal government, which is generally much cheaper.

The Attorney General's office sometimes gets inquiries about these companies.

"What we tell consumers is that the information is free, and it's not necessary to pay for it," said Mary Horsch, public information officer for the Attorney General's office.

"Sometimes the companies just provide a list of places the consumer can go to get that information, so the consumer still has to do the leg work," she said. "If people do have problems with those companies, we encourage them to fill out a complaint and file it with our office."

Students sometimes get even less for their money.

"There are a number of them out there that simply provide no information at all," Moeder said. "Students send in their money in and nothing comes back, and the company disappears after a couple of months."

It appears a new scam is working in Arkansas, Oklahoma and Texas, and it could be moving into Kansas.

"What they are doing is calling students, telling them about all the unused scholarship dollars sitting out there and how that student has an opportunity to get some of that money," Moeder said.

During the telephone conversation, the company gets the student's bank name and account number. The company calls the bank to verify money in the account, then puts through a bank draft.

Blue jeans support gays, BaGaLs says

The Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society will attempt to make a point about discrimination of minorities today as part of National Coming Out Day.

Today, wearing blue jeans will show support for homosexuals and lesbians, and show other people how discrimination feels, said Robert, co-president of BaGaLs, who asked his last name to be withheld.

"Enough people will read our posters and mention to people wearing blue jeans that they are supporting gays and lesbians," he said. "Those people will realize discrimination is not a good thing to have."

Kevyn Jacobs, freshman in arts and sciences, said today is not about supporting homosexuals and lesbians, but teaching people how it feels to be discriminated over something they have no control over.

REGIONAllie the Dog sniffs out Lawrence drugs

LAWRENCE (AP) — Allie the Labrador went straight from the pound to the sheriff's office, but it sure is better than what could have happened to him.

The Douglas County sheriff's department couldn't afford to buy a dog to help smell out narcotics and track missing people. So deputy Steve Brown went to the Lawrence Humane Society and adopted Allie, a 40-pound black Labrador retriever.

Brown, who adopted the dog Sept. 25, attended sessions at a special animal training center and is now training Allie.

Allie will also graduate into the department's Drug Abuse Resistance Education program and go with Brown when he speaks to area school children about the dangers of drug use.

Roma Tesch, manager of the animal shelter, said Allie is particularly suited to his work because he is friendly, and Labradors have a keen sense of smell.

Tesch said Allie had been left at the shelter Sept. 3 because his original owner couldn't care for him anymore.

She said the dog was spared the fate of many animals left at the shelter, which means putting them to sleep if they are not adopted.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week not harmonious

Editorial, approach of organizers concern students

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week was not viewed as being very harmonious by some groups of international students.

The International Coordinating Council, delegates representing various international student organizations, discussed the Oct. 8 Collegian editorial, "Harmony," and the participation of the African Student Union in the week's events.

RACIAL/ETHNIC HARMONY WEEK

The paragraph in question read, "This week wasn't planned for international students or homosexuals. They seem to be the ones always struggling to fit in. This week was planned for the University as a whole in an effort to lessen that struggle." This paragraph was the subject of criticism at the meeting.

Peter Manyothwane, sophomore in mechanical engineering and president of African Student Union, said the editorial was self contradictory. "If you say Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week was planned for the University as a whole, how can you say it was not planned for the international students?"

"An editorial like that doesn't make the situation better," Manyothwane said.

The other issue in question was the way the African Student Union was approached to participate in Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Manyothwane said he received a phone call last week from a committee member who said there was a slot open for the African students to perform Thursday in the K-State Union. "We were told to do some entertainment, not asked how we thought we could contribute," Manyothwane said.

Manyothwane called a meeting of the African Student Union, and the organization decided not to participate in the event Thursday.

"It's not that we're being uncooperative, it's just that we should have been approached in a different manner," Manyothwane said.

Manyothwane said giving a performance may not be the best way to promote racial harmony.

"There is a distance between the performer and the audience. As long as the audience doesn't first understand who that person is, the message is not going to come across," he said.

"I think this is a very serious matter. It seems like it's being taken very lightly, like it's just one of those things that happens once and a while — racism happens every day."

Phillip Anderson, instructor of speech and chairman of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week Committee, said every effort was made to include everyone.

"We've contacted ICC to apologize," Anderson said. "We welcome their participation, and we're willing to listen to any criticism."

Diana Caldwell, coordinator of the Multicultural Student Organization and Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week Committee member, said it is ironic that mistakes were made in an attempt to be inclusive.

"We made a human error. We should have been more respectful when we approached the students," she said.

Caldwell said timing was also a factor. She said the ICC was contacted during the summer, but officers weren't elected until the end of September.

Anderson said he welcomes the participation of ICC on next year's Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week Committee.

Manyothwane said that although there were problems with Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, having it is better than doing nothing at all.

Relationships challenging

Interracial involvements demand effort

By the Collegian Staff

A workshop titled "Exploring the Issues of Interracial Relationships" was conducted Thursday afternoon in the Union.

The workshop began with a one act-play performed by the Graphic Arts Theatre, and was followed with a panel discussion.

The plot is about two blacks who meet years after their love affair ended. They both became successful and the black man later marries a white woman. The woman accuses the man of betraying her and the black race.

The panel consisted of four people who were currently or had at one time been in an interracial relationship.

A recurring question was "how have others close to you responded to your interracial relationships?"

"I definitely notice people looking at us other than other couples," said Eric Benson, junior in exercise science and Spanish.

One white woman from the audience said that she has been living with a black man and they are considering marriage. But her parents refuse to meet him and threaten that they will never talk to her again if she goes through with the marriage.

Similar stories were told by other audience members.

"The main idea is that you have to live with the decision that you make, not anyone else," said Shirlyn Henry Brown, graduate student in theater.

Do races lose their ethnicity by mixing races? This question consumed most of the last part of the workshop.

"The minority races in different countries seem to see it as losing their ethnicity while the majority views it as just tainting it a little. I look at it as not losing my culture but gaining another," said Doug Benson, professor of modern languages.

Carina Givens, junior in family studies and pre-law, who is black, Japanese and Native American said, "I can't help but date interracially."

"I don't consider myself losing anything. I learned to speak Japanese and English. I was taught many different cultures and exposed to lots of different music," said Charlene Shropshire, secretary II in the cooperative extension office.

KU vs. K-STATE, 1991. There's nothing civil about it.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Go, Cats It's not just a game, it's an adventure

The K-State-KU football game is not just a game — it's an adventure.

And with the realization that Manhattan will turn into a jungleland fraught with danger this weekend, your buddies at the Collegian now bring you a few safety tips to make your weekend safe.

First, after we win the game Saturday, don't tear down the goal posts. Rumor has it the authorities will be photographing those who partake in such shenanigans, and they could face possible legal action. It would be a shame to spend the weekend in jail.

Second, don't riot in Aggieville. Police have a tendency to respond to riots with clubs and tear gas. No one wants to spend his or her weekend at the hospital getting stitches or oxygen — then going to jail.

Third, and most importantly, be smart about consuming alcoholic beverages. Know your limit, and keep an eye on your friends as well. Don't drink and drive, and don't ride with anyone who has been doing so. A long walk home beats a short drive to jail or the mortuary.

With that messy business out of the way, we also remind you to have fun.

Buy a KU student a beer after the game, and tell him even though his football team got trampled and he goes to a marginal school, you wouldn't mind having him work for you some day.

And take a minute sometime this weekend to listen to that voice coming out of the heavens saying again and again, "Go, Cats, Go."

Sidewalk chalk wars out of hand

The chalk wars being fought on campus sidewalks are ridiculous.

Students for Life has been trying to advertise a meeting this week and get anti-abortion messages to students by chalking.

Some pro-choice groups or individuals have taken it upon themselves to erase, cross out or chalk around the Students for Life messages with pro-choice messages of their own.

This is not about the abortion conflict. This is about rights and respect.

Students for Life's right to chalk messages is protected, not only by the University, but by the Constitution.

Among our guaranteed and inalienable rights are the rights to speak freely and assemble.

Thwarting people's Constitutional rights is uncool.

Pro-choice advocates took pride in themselves and garnered respect from others for their peaceful, fair conduct during the abortion protests in Wichita not too long ago.

And a mainstay of the pro-choice mindset is that making abortion illegal is an infringement on a woman's right to choose.

If these pro-choice chalk bandits are for people's rights, they should practice what they preach in more than just one arena.

People listened in Wichita when pro-choicers followed the rules and respected pro-lifers' rights to protest and express their own views. So these tactics are unnecessary.

Chalk your own messages, but don't mess with anyone else's.

Have some respect — if not for a view you can't or don't support — then simply for the rights of common citizens.

Homes Safe heaters, clean fireplaces hot subject

Though the last couple of weeks have turned warm on Kansans, soon we will want to fire up those heaters again.

Which, of course, brings to mind safety.

Students and Manhattanites alike should clean out those heater rooms and make sure filters are changed.

Students should contact their landlords and make sure everything is in working order. And people with fireplaces should make sure their chimneys are swept and flues are clean.

If there are any questions about the safety of heaters or fireplaces, students should contact the fire department to inspect them. And if there are any hassles with landlords about getting heaters serviced, these should be reported immediately to the City of Manhattan authorities.

Winters and cold days are dreary enough when you're going to school. A fire or an explosion would make those days even worse.

SHANTA BAILEY GUEST

Shanta Bailey is a junior in pre-pharmacy and the president of the Black Student Union.

These past five days we have been trying to racially and ethnically unite. Considering the world has been here for millions of years, I would compare this week to five blades of grass in a five-acre field.

Don't get me wrong. I take pride in Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. I especially take pride in the fact that I attend workshops and functions on my own accord and not to fill some sort of multi-cultural requirement.

This is my point. In order for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week to benefit you, your heart must be in the right place — in your chest not on your resume. And if so, it should not take the student body and the administration long to figure out that we live in a multi-cultural society every day of the week and every month of the year.

Students and administration, we must prepare to put Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week to the test. There are 51 other weeks of the year in which we can use what we learned and address what we didn't.

Let's address the prejudice minority students have to deal with on this campus, outside of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, and together let's search for some solutions. Realize it will take longer than any five to seven days.

Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week is proof that things are getting better, but we still have a long way to go.

Again, I am not downing Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week. It is a step in the right direction.

But let's go all the way up the ladder and admit there is racism on this campus and in our classrooms. And let's realize we can't humor the ignorance of racism to the point that it affects grades or any other way minority students function in this University.

Tonight is the close of Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week, and unfortunately, we can't wait until next year.

'The Cold Within'

The following poem was submitted by Ann Wallis, sophomore in psychology, for Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week.

Six humans trapped by the happenstance
In black and bitter cold
Each one possessed a stick of wood,
Or so the story's told.

Their dying fire in need of logs,
The first woman held hers back
For on the faces around the fire,
She noticed one was black.

The next man looking across the way
Saw one not of his church,
And couldn't bring himself to give
The fire his stick of birch.

The third one sat in tattered clothes
He gave his coat a hitch.
Why should his log be put to use
To warm the idle rich?

The rich man just sat back and thought
Of the wealth he had in store.
And how to keep what he had earned
From the lazy, shiftless poor.

The black man's face bespoke revenge
As the fire passed from his sight,
For all he saw in his stick of wood
Was a chance to spite the white.

And the last man of this forlorn group
Did naught except for gain.
Giving only to those who gave
Was how he played the game.

The logs held tight in death's still hands
Was proof of human sin.
They didn't die from the cold without,
They died from the cold within.

JARED GREGOIRE

As I begin my mad descent into journalistic suicide, I take a moment to congratulate those people who participated in last Sunday's life chain along Bluemont Avenue, which supported the pro-life stance.

I do not do this because I am a pro-lifer. Nor do I applaud them for "witnessing the fact to the community (that) ... Abortion kills children," as Alan Oberley said.

Instead, I applaud them because the life chain participants behaved like human beings, choosing not to delve into the near animal-like behavior common in other certain anti-abortion groups of late.

The life chain participants managed to exercise their rights to speech and peaceful assembly without impeding the rights of others — especially of those who may not have shared the same opinion — and deserve to be recognized for that fact.

Now that I've slipped the noose around my neck for good, I go one step further and say the time has come for the issue of abortion and all related topics to be considered moot.

I say this because peaceful demonstrations such as the life chain are too few and far between. The issue of abortion has grown beyond this country's capability to handle it with reason and logic. And if allowed to continue on its currently unrestrained course, this controversy will surely tear apart the very fabric of our society.

The heart of this problem does not lie solely with either the pro-lifers or those of pro-choice. The fault resides within both groups and their abysmal lack of respect for each other — respect in the sense of not blindly believing that all opinions contrary to theirs should be stamped out like a rampant disease.

As for the passionate individuals within each group who go to extremes in verbalizing their views, I say, "What a few may do eventually reflects upon the whole."

There is simply no way to prevent a side of the issue from being viewed in its entirety, not as a group of individuals with varying degrees of opinion.

As I'm sticking my head in the oven with a lighted match in hand, I can already hear the questions thrown at my charges.

"If the point of abortion is made moot, who will protect the rights of all the unborn children?"
"If the issue is made bodiless, who will protect the rights of the mother?"

"If the issue is to be insolvent, what will we possibly do with all the energy of our desires to cause duress to the other side?"

What to do with all that energy?

There is an outlet for a number of possibilities, many surely better than human beings screaming and cursing at each other for having a contrary thought. I would submit further that this energy be concentrated not in wasted outbursts of emotion but in finding a suitable forum where the issue can finally be resolved and laid to rest.

And one may ask where this forum would be. That I am not terribly sure of, but I can tell you where it should not be.

It should not be out on the streets, on insipid Hollywood talk shows or even in the church. It is in these places that everyone does not have an equal voice, and that is where we falter when we debate this issue.

Believe me, I have never lost my passion for a good ol' debate or intense discussion. This is one of the very things that makes us human and different from one another. But I will be the first to walk away when the discussion becomes futile, condescending or just plain empty.

Unfortunately, the issue of abortion has become just that — empty and futile.

There are no winners, and there will always be those who can't understand that, after a time, some things are just better left alone. Perhaps when we all start behaving like humans, we will come to this realization.

Soviet radar could locate Stealth Bomber

B-2 not invisible, says Air Force chief of staff

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The Air Force's top officer, in an unusually candid assessment, said Wednesday that Soviet air defenses probably could detect the radar-evading B-2 stealth bomber if it were flying its wartime mission today.

Gen. Merrill McPeak, the Air Force chief of staff, made the comment while elaborating on the Pentagon's standard statement that the B-2 never was intended to be invisible to air defenses but would be extremely hard to track and shoot down.

Questions about the B-2's ability to penetrate air defenses are an important part of debate in Congress over whether the nation should spend the $30 billion more the Air Force says is needed to produce a fleet of 75 B-2s. A decade of developing the airplane already has cost about $30 billion.

In a meeting with reporters at the Pentagon, McPeak was asked whether the Soviets were trying to improve their already extensive air-defense network to the point at which, within 10 years, they would be able to pick up the B-2 bomber. The plane is in the early stages of production and not flying missions.

McPeak, who returned Tuesday from an eight-day official visit to the Soviet Union, said he couldn't offer any details about Soviet air defense improvements. Then he added: "By the way, I expect that certain parts of their air defense setup would be able to detect the B-2 today, so we don't have to wait 10 years."

"No one has ever argued that the B-2 is invisible or immortal," the four-star general said. "What we've argued is that it is a very hard target to shoot down, and I expect that'll still be true 10 years from now."

The B-2 incorporates the latest advances in secret technologies that minimize its "profile" on radar screens and make it unusually difficult to detect the plane by its engine heat or noise. The Air Force says the technologies are far more sophisticated than those used on the F-117A stealth fighter that successfully struck heavily defended targets in Iraq during the Persian Gulf War.

Each B-2 is estimated to cost about $865 million. Doubts about the future of the program have increased since the demise of the Cold War and, more recently, by a disclosure that the plane failed a July 26 stealth test.

McPeak strongly defended the B-2 and said Congress should provide the production funds.

"I'm absolutely confident that we will solve the B-2 problems," he said, referring to the failed stealth flight test. "There's no doubt about that."

McPeak said he saw "no evidence" during his visit to Soviet air bases and other military installations that the Soviets were undertaking a major restructuring of their air defenses to try to cope with stealth aircraft. Even if they were, he said, the B-2 would not be vulnerable in the foreseeable future.

"We, the U.S. Air Force, know more about stealth than anybody else, and we do not know how to defend against stealth aircraft. So if we don't know how to do it, it's not clear to me how anybody else would start on that problem," he said.

McPeak also said he concluded from his conversations with top Soviet military officers — including Gen. Yevgeny Shaposhnikov, the former air force chief who was elevated to defense minister after the failed August coup — that the main object of Soviet arms control interest is multiple-warhead nuclear missiles.

One occasion, Wright said, Thomas told her she looked attractive and then said, "What size are your breasts?"

She said she did not answer but asked him a question on another subject.

Wright said Thomas fired her in April 1985 and told her she was not aggressive enough in dismissing veteran EEOC employees. Thomas later gave her a positive job recommendation.

"The White House has been notified by the Judiciary Committee staff that they intend to call another witness to testify against Judge Thomas," White House spokesman Sean Walsh said Thursday night. "We cannot discuss the details of this matter, but Judge Thomas will deal with the allegations in the course of the hearings."

The source said Wright was a "mid-level" staffer at the EEOC. It was not clear when she worked at the agency or for how long.

Walsh complained that the committee had not requested or pursued an FBI investigation of Wright's complaints, "as is normal practice."

Hill, a University of Oklahoma law professor and a former aide to Thomas at EEOC, is expected to be the lead witness when the hearings begin Friday morning. At stake in the proceedings is Thomas' bitterly fought nomination to the Supreme Court.

"He knows it's been terribly damaging but he wants to do what he can to clear this cloud off his character," said Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, who will act as Thomas' chief Senate defender in the hearings.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SPORTS

DAVID SVOBODA

This one is big, folks

Same song, umpteenth verse. Those two football rivals — K-State and the University of Kansas — are once again set to square off.

And it's a game that Coach Bill Snyder's Wildcat troops desperately need to win.

It has been well documented that these are two pretty good football teams — or at least teams far better than their recent predecessors.

Glen Mason has never lost a game against the Cats during his tenure at Kansas, while Snyder has yet to coach a group that beats the Hawks.

Therein lies the problem.

And, yes, it is a big problem.

If you don't win what is arguably the biggest game of the year, if you don't beat an intrastate rival, if you can't dispose of the trash from up the river ... well, you know the rest.

Or do you?

Several things come from a win over Kansas, and they're things that can't be gained by wins over every team in New Mexico or every team that's not in the Top 25 from a state whose name begins with "I."

The first thing that comes from a win over KU is the ability to sway in-state recruits to give K-State a longer look. As long as KU keeps beating K-State on the football field, Kansas kids would be crazy to seriously consider going to what's perceived as the lesser of the two schools on the gridiron.

Snyder has been able to cast a spell on some Sunflower State players, telling them they'll be part of a group that can finally dominate the dreaded Jayhawks. But even Snyder's magic will wear off if some tangible results aren't attained.

And they need to be attained soon.

Another thing that can come from a win over Kansas — especially if it's one gained at home — is cash.

Given the present financial situation of the K-State athletic program, and the fickle nature of local fans, a win over KU would be a shot in the arm to the whole Wildcat athletic program like none administered in recent memory.

For one, fans aren't really impressed with wins over the aforementioned little folks. Beat a Big Eight team, they say, then we'll come.

Well, the Cats did just that last season, and they did it twice — in Manhattan, no less.

Those same fans then up the ante. Beat KU for a change, they say, then we'll come.

No snappy comeback for that one, huh, guys? Probably just a few more fannies in the seats.

And then there are the fat cats (pardon the pun) who take part in tailgate parties, write big checks to the Mike Ahearn Scholarship Fund, and dine with the big folks at University functions.

These people have checkbooks where zero is the predominant number adorning the slips of paper containing their collective John Hancock's.

Try beating KU once or twice on the gridiron. Then see how many of these supporters kick in a bit more money or how many of those hardened skeptics are convinced finally that "the Snyder guy can coach."

It all amounts to a ton of pressure for a coaching staff and a group of 18- to 22-year-olds to handle. And, quite frankly, it's probably more pressure than they deserve to have to handle.

But that's where we are right now. KU and Mason are a couple of years ahead, and there's but one quick way of closing ground.

If it isn't closed Saturday, it might not be for a long time to come.

Cats look to end frustration

Sophomore free safety Jaime Mendez backpedals in a defensive drill during Tuesday's practice in preparation for Saturday's game with KU. The Homecoming contest is slated for 1:10 p.m. at KSU Stadium.

Avery silences Bucs; Braves even series

By the Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — Steve Avery is too young to know the Braves aren't supposed to win in October.

The 21-year-old again pitched with poise and Atlanta bounced back Thursday night to beat the Pittsburgh Pirates 1-0 — with a chop, naturally — to send the NL playoffs south tied at one game each.

Mark Lemke's two-hopper eluded sure-handed third baseman Steve Buechele for an RBI double in the sixth inning, and that was enough, barely. Avery and Atlanta stopped the Braves' 10-game postseason losing streak, one short of the Philadelphia Phillies' record skid.

Avery gave up six hits in 8½ innings, struck out nine and, unlike Tom Glavine in the opener, shut down Pittsburgh's middle of the order for the most part. Plus, he was at his best when it really counted.

Avery retired Game 1 hero Andy Van Slyke on a grounder with runners on first and third to end the eighth inning. Then in the ninth, Bobby Bonilla led off with a double, making him 6-for-12 lifetime against Avery. That brought up Barry Bonds, and with the Pirates' star showing no signs of bunting, popped up to shortstop.

Braves manager Bobby Cox felt that was enough for Avery and summoned Alejandro Pena from the bullpen. Pena put himself in further trouble with a wild pitch that sent Bonilla to third, but then showed why he has been the Braves' saver, and savior, since they got him from the New York Mets in late August.

Pena, 12-for-12 in save situations, got Buechele on a grounder back to the mound and struck out pinch-hitter Curtis Wilkerson on three pitches to end it. The Braves rushed to the mound to celebrate and ran off the field signalling with tomahawk chops.

Avery, as he did all during the stretch, when he beat the Los Angeles Dodgers twice in five days — including his only shutout of the season — was in control. He walked his first batter of the game, but if he was nervous, it did not show as he struck out the next three batters and walked only one more.

Even the largest crowd in Pirates' home history, 57,533, did not rattle Avery. And when he walked off the mound after getting Van Slyke, he punched at the air as a small section of Braves' fans began the team's war chant.

It figures to be a lot louder Saturday for Game 3 in Atlanta in front of the Braves' frenzied fans. John Smiley (20-8) will start for Pittsburgh against John Smoltz (14-13).

Zane Smith matched zeros with Avery until the sixth, when David Justice led off with a single. He then moved to second on Greg Olson's one-out grounder, setting up the game's critical play.

Smith worked carefully with Lemke, who had singled and fled to the warning track. On a 3-2 pitch, Lemke hit a chopper near the third base bag as Buechele and Justice both approached.

Buechele, acquired in a trade with Texas in August, has already set an AL record for the best-fielding season by a third baseman. But this time, he did not get the job done.

No student who is spreading four years of college into six has anything but bad memories of the K-State-KU series.

The famous Aggieville Riot that followed K-State's last win over KU is almost ancient history. The last four meetings of the Sunflower Series have seen the Wildcats let opportunity after opportunity slip away.

This season, both teams enter the contest with three tune-up wins over weaker non-conference opponents under their belts. Both have also been brought down to earth by tough road losses. While the Jayhawks lost to Virginia 31-19 last weekend, the Wildcats had the week off, allowing them an additional week to prepare after a 56-3 loss to Washington.

While the extra week allowed for concentration on individual fundamentals and time for injuries to heal, Coach Bill Snyder doesn't claim to possess any advantage.

"You would think that having 14 days that you could make better preparation for an opponent, but I don't know that that's necessarily the case," Snyder said. "You still have to coach against virtually the same things.

"When you add that additional period of time, your opponent understands that and probably alters the things that they do. There's also always the potential that without a game coming up, the motivation isn't always as strong as you would like for it to be in the initial stages of preparation."

Although additional preparation may not be a concern in Snyder's eyes, the health of his players must be. Snyder's policy of withholding injury reports makes the status of several key players a question that won't be answered until game time. Starting cornerback Rogerick Green and fullback Rod Schiller have both missed the last two games with injuries. Wide receiver Andre Coleman missed the Washington game, and running back Eric Gallon suffered an injury in the contest.

The health of each could play a key role in K-State's success Saturday, but none more than quarterback Paul Watson. The Wichita Eagle reported that Watson suffered an eye injury in an off-field incident last weekend. Watson has worn goggles in practice this week, but has not

Golfers set for final meet

Elliott hopes team can cap successful fall

ERIC BROWN

Sports Writer

In a season marked by steady improvement and consistency, the K-State golf program has shown significant progress.

But if the women golfers want to wear smiles when the smoke clears, they must pass one final test this weekend.

K-State travels to Iowa City Saturday for the Hawkeye Invitational, the last of four fall meets. The other three, the Cyclone Classic, the Roadrunner Invitational and the Shocker Fall Classic resulted in finishes of fourth, 11th and first. The team was scheduled to play last weekend at the Northern Illinois Huskie Invitational, but the tournament was canceled due to bad weather.

If the Cats want to make the winter off-season a bright one, their finish among the 12-team field looms large.

"We would like to feel good about the fall, and to do that, they need to have a good meet here," K-State coach Mark Elliott said. "We need to finish on a good note so we can start off next spring with the momentum."

K-State will be looking to duplicate last year's finish at the tournament that set University records. Last season, K-State finished third at the meet with a score of 970, 20 strokes better than K-State's previous best. The team also set a single-round record of 322.

Both records have since been broken, but the fact remains that the Finkbine Golf Course in Iowa City has been good to the Cats. Even better news may be that four of the five players who played there last year will be making this season's trip.

"We set new course records there last year," Elliott said. "This is the type of course we should be successful on. All of them seem to like the course, and since we've been off for a while, they should be ready to play."

The four that return to Iowa are seniors Theresa Coyle and Adena Hagedorn, junior Valerie Hahn and sophomore Denise Pottle. Making their first trip to Iowa will be Jacque Wright and sophomore Julie White. White will become the eighth player to see action this fall.

Elliott said Hahn, who has been the team's No. 1 player in the past, needs to improve her play. Hahn has yet to have a round under 80 this fall.

Coyle's performance has been one of K-State's bright spots, Elliott said.

"Theresa has had a great fall," he said. "She needs to continue to play well for the team to meet its potential."

Elliott also said that Hagedorn has had an up-and-down fall and needs to gain some consistency in her game.

The meet will include host and defending champion Iowa, Illinois, Michigan State, Minnesota, UMKC, Nebraska, Northern Illinois, Northern Iowa, Southern Illinois, Wisconsin and Pepperdine.

Effort in loss lifts spikers

FRANK KLEEMANN

Sports Writer

The K-State volleyball team's five-set loss to Kansas on Wednesday was tough, but there's not much time for looking back.

K-State will play Washburn University at 5 p.m. today in the opening round of the Wichita State Invitational.

Despite the loss to the Jayhawks, K-State will attempt to duplicate what K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer said was her team's best outing of the season.

"We have to play in the tournament like in the game against Kansas," Coach Hagemeyer said. "It was a great match and by far the best we have ever played."

"We started awful in the first game. We walked on the court, and thought we'll just see how it goes."

Things got better for the Cats after the shaky start.

"We started to earn more points," Hagemeyer said. "We started to take control of a few things, and we played that way throughout the rest of the match."

Hagemeyer said she was pleased with the strength of the Cats' blocking play. The defense recorded 98 digs in the match.

For K-State, which fell to 6-11 overall and 0-4 in Big Eight play, the contest served as a springboard for the weekend.

"We play Washburn tonight, and we'll recover from our long match at KU," Hagemeyer said. "The team is ready to play, and they are looking forward to win the tournament. I'd like to see our focus more on winning tonight's match."

Hagemeyer said the tournament field will present some tough tests.

"Washburn is an unknown team for us right now," she said. "St. Francis is an outstanding team. They have been ranked in the NAIA division for a long time. I expect that they have a pretty fast offense."

Washburn is in the middle of a five-match losing streak. The Ichabods are 5-18 under Coach Kelly Osburn.

St. Francis, K-State's first opponent on Saturday, enters the tournament with a 17-7 mark. Hagemeyer said St. Francis' offensive line is talented.

Setter Karen Simmons leads the team with a .402 hitting percentage and has just five errors in 127 attempts. St. Francis has a total of 2,167 kill attempts.

Unlike St. Francis and Washburn, Wichita State is all but a stranger to K-State.

The Cats' recent memories of the Shockers are hard to forget. K-State lost to Wichita State in four games on Sept. 17 in Manhattan.

"I personally don't think that we played them that great last time," Hagemeyer said.

Union introduces new Wildcat apparel collection

Sales higher than last year at this time, says Yates

MELANIE HUNDLEY
Collegian Reporter

With fall approaching, K-State apparel is changing its colors.

The K-State Union Bookstore has acquired a few new clothing suppliers for specific reasons, said Nancy Bartell, Union Bookstore clothing and gift buyer.

"We want a fashion look with different colors and more color combinations," she said. "Traditional K-State items with a fashion look in mind."

The Wildcat Collection is a special addition exclusively designed for the Union Bookstore by Genus in Ohio. The company produces similar lines for other universities including the University of Kansas, said Union Bookstore Supply Manager Kathy Yates.

Sweatshirts and windbreakers are examples of items in the Wildcat Collection, which sport the distinctive Willie the Wildcat logo on the lower, left sleeve.

The public has responded positively to the new items. Yates said sales are higher now than they were last year at this time.

"Being style-conscious gives students and alumni a reason to come back to the bookstore to shop for more than just basic K-State clothing," Bartell said.

The Union Bookstore centers promotions around activities happening on campus.

Yates said Parents' and Homecoming weekends are the best weekends for business.

Another item that will hit the Union Bookstore racks just in time for Homecoming is a new K-State-KU feud design, Yates said.

She said all the revenue produced in the Union Bookstore is used for events in the Union.

"Many students don't know that money spent in the Union Bookstore remains in the Union. It keeps Union-sponsored movies and trips inexpensive and brings lectures here," she said.

He said a student recently called the financial aid office with a question about such a phone call.

The student had received a call from a person who claimed to be from the financial aid office, and that person said the student's loan check was at the office. The student said the person knew the amount of the check and the office needed to know the student's bank account number so the check could be directly deposited.

"Unfortunately, the student did give the account number. That call did not come from our office," Moeder said. The financial aid office does not directly deposit any checks for students.

"What we want to get across to students is they shouldn't ever give out the name of their banks or their account numbers, and don't give out credit card information over the phone," he said.

Moeder also said students who want to use a scholarship search company should look at the information the company says it will provide.

Funding policy studied

Senate committee will consider political, religious student group allocations

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

A written policy is needed to assist Student Senate when it decides whether to fund student groups that are partisan in nature, Senate officials said Thursday.

STUDENT SENATE

The ad hoc committee for funding political groups met Thursday night to make such a policy, but due to committee members' other commitments, the meeting was cut short and no decision was reached.

Craig Raborn, the committee's chairman, said the committee will meet again Sunday in the Student Government office to finish what was started Thursday night.

The committee was formed last spring when questions were raised during Senate allocations about funding student groups with certain ideologies such as College Republicans, SAVE, Southwind and Amnesty International.

"It's really a gray area," he said.

"There isn't going to be a perfect solution to this problem, but it's something we're going to have to deal with in the future."

Raborn said in the past, Senate has followed an unwritten rule to fund all student groups meeting the funding criteria regardless of the group's ideology. But without a written policy, consistent decisions were hard to make.

"We usually funded on a speech content-neutral basis," he said. "Most likely, our new written policy will just be writing out the previous unwritten policy."

the area, so that won't be a temptation."

In 1987, 300 police officers were employed to maintain order in the Aggieville area, Johnson said. In 1989, there were 200 officers.

This year, in addition to the full complement from RCPD, there will be 30 KHP officers, 21 K-State officers and 18 KU officers.

ABA-sponsored volunteers will also assist police at the four entrance checkpoints into the area.

Spike Lee's latest movie starts fashion

Students wear Malcolm X apparel in honor of leader

DEBRA MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

X marks the spot. Spike Lee, the well-known director of the box office hit movies "School Daze," "Do the Right Thing" and "Jungle Fever," is at it again. Lee's upcoming movie "Malcolm X" has started the latest fashion among black people everywhere.

"In this day and age, when the passive resistance is somewhat passe, the 'by any means necessary' mentality made by Malcolm X is very much in fashion."

Stanton Weeks

Malcolm X headgear, shirts, and jackets are being worn in the remembrance of the radical, militant black leader who advised black people to acquire their civil rights "by any means necessary." During the Civil Rights Movement, Malcolm X believed in the aggressive resistance through rallies, strikes, boycotts and riots.

Black students at K-State are hip to the fashion. Many say they wear the fashion because they believe in what Malcolm X stood for and look up to him as a role model.

"I proudly wear the Malcolm X hat in remembrance of a man who stood for, and was motivated toward, change," said Stanton Weeks, junior in physical therapy.

The hats are black with a big, white "X" on the front (colors may vary). The cost of the Malcolm X hats range from $17.50 to $5 for knock-offs. According to USA Today, the revenue from the hat sales goes to the store that Lee owns — Spike's Joint — and helps finance Lee's films.

Just like any sports fan, students wear the fashion to show who they favor.

"I believe that it is a symbol of my culture," said Andre Coleman, sophomore in broadcast journalism. "And I wear it for the same reason someone wears a Chicago Bulls' hat, because I like him and what he did for my people."

Some students believe that the fashion is just a statement of moving forward in the world as a black person and standing on one's own two feet.

"Spike Lee is making a statement — 'We need to move forward as a race and start getting our own businesses,'" said William Coleman, junior in electrical engineering technology. "It's a statement of self-pride and self-knowledge."

Award-winning actor Denzel Washington will portray Malcolm X in the upcoming movie about the life of Malcolm X as a leader. The movie will appear in theaters next summer.

"In this day and age, when the passive resistance is somewhat passe, the 'by any means necessary' mentality made by Malcolm X is very much in fashion," Weeks said.

Men helpless in today's society of guys like my dad. Don't get me wrong, I like men, and I have a deep appreciation for traditional guys like my father.

Men's movement: 'I mean, what's the point? It's a joke.'

Life is tough for you guys. I think the world of men like my father is long gone. I trace its fall directly to the introduction of light beer and the designated hitter rule in major-league baseball.

The 1990s are difficult times for all of us, but traditional "men's men" feel it the worst, I think. You're expected to be politically correct, accept that women now work out of the home and sometimes actually wear hard hats. And well, hell, sometimes we even make you watch "Designing Women" instead of "Monday Night Football."

For traditional guys who sometimes still slip and use the word "broad" or "chick," these are very troubling times indeed.

Oh, yes, I could ramble on about how tough it is to be a woman, especially in what is still predominantly a man's world, but what's the point? We've heard it all before.

Until the battling sexes each stop taking an isolationist approach to gender issues, we will never come to any kind of agreement, truce or common ground.

Before I started on a rampage about how little sympathy I had for whiny, bored, overprivileged guys jumping on the men's movement bandwagon, I made myself stop and think for just a moment. Well, actually a couple of days passed between being asked to write this piece and finally putting my thoughts on paper.

On my way over to the office, still bent on bashing men and all movements connected to anything male, I came across a sight that put things into perspective for me.

Passing a vending machine on campus near lunchtime, I thought, "Gee, it would be nice to have some microwave popcorn."

And, at that moment, a little light bulb went on above my head. My dad is a big fan of microwave popcorn and eats it nearly every night while he watches television.

One night, my mother had fallen asleep early. Around 11:30 p.m., I wandered into the kitchen to find my father — box of microwave popcorn in hand — standing in front of the microwave with a puzzled look on his face.

"What's wrong," I asked, "are you out of popcorn?"

■ See MEN, Page 9

LISA EDMUNDS

I felt like poor Emily Litella last week when I heard some fellas talking about "the men's movement."

Men's movement? Well, I said to myself, you are over 30 years old now, and maybe your hearing is gone. I was sure I heard them wrong.

"Men's room," I figured, "I bet they were looking for a men's room."

Life had not gotten quite surreal enough yet for me to actually believe somebody had started a men's movement.

I mean, what's the point? Really. It's a joke, right?

What exactly do these fellas think they're missing? From where I stand on the food chain, they've got a pretty good gig going. They draw higher salaries and better positions in the work place, thus controlling most of the money and power in your basic, run-of-the-mill White Bourgeois Male Society.

What do white American men really have to complain about? That pesky instant replay rule in the NFL? A drastic increase in the price of Skoal or Budweiser? New styles in jock strap fashion that pinch and poke and ride up in the back all day?

Surely you jest.

Some might think the whole idea of a men's movement laughable. As if fat, white, middle-class men haven't grabbed all the gusto already available in the retarded and dysfunctional society we call 20th-century America.

When I picture the "Iron John" readers of this world, I have an image

Robertson releases new album

'Storyville' captures heart of New Orleans

PAT WALLECK
A&E Writer

Musical artists can be like a fine wine — they can get better with age. This is the case with Robbie Robertson.

His new album, "Storyville," shows the incredible growth of this vintage performer.

Robertson first showed up on the music scene about 1965 with screaming Ronnie Hawkins. Fellow Canadians Garth Hudson, Rick Danko and Richard Manuel soon teamed together with Arkansas native Levon Helm to form the Band.

As the Band's main lyricist and guitarist, Robertson has penned the classic songs "The Night They Drove Ol' Dixie Down," "The Weight" and many others during the Band's 15-year career.

Trip Shakespeare moves listeners with new release

Minstrel sounds created through modern instruments

ROD GILLESPIE
A&E Writer

A ragged band of traveling musicians set up in a clearing to entertain the local villagers in exchange for food, ale and a coin or two.

At first, the musicians hold the audience spellbound with intricate madrigal vocal harmonies and instrumental arrangements on the harp and lute.

Suddenly, the players crank up their fretless bass, some electric guitars and proceed to blow the townsfolk away.

These are the images that come to mind when Trip Shakespeare's latest release, "Lulu," spins in the CD player. If a group of traveling Renaissance-era minstrels were given 20th-Century instruments, it would sound like that.

Trip Shakespeare's energetic and heartfelt live performances reflect the band's love for traveling and performing.

This earnest affection for the minstrel lifestyle infuses "Lulu" as well, and it is this genuine love of music that makes the album so good.

There is also a quality of honesty to "Lulu" that sets it apart from typical music industry formula rock. "Lulu" is filled with songs that touch the listener deeply. The vocals and lyrics bare Trip Shakespeare's collective soul.

Two tunes in particular, "Lulu" and "Today You Move," are literally bursting with emotional intensity. Both songs deal with failed relationships. On "Lulu," bassist John Munson's melancholy baritone voice laments a lost love.

"Lonely when I hear the band/ That used to play when we were looking for music/Lonely when I hear the band/Do you remember, do you recall?/Remember when you held my hand you used to say 'I love you so much.'"

The lyrics of "Today You Move" tell the story of a man who, unfaithful but repentant, helps his ex-lover move out of their apartment. Brothers Dan and Matt Wilson team up for sweet vocal harmonies and create a truly moving listening experience.

"I've been a vandal to my own home/Under the snakey moon/So now when I come to see the old place/I want to be of use."

But all this vocal virtuosity doesn't overshadow the fact that these minstrels can play their instruments. Munson, for example, displays a rare gift on the fretless bass with his evocative lines in "Will You Be Found" and "Today You Move." Drummer Elaine Wilson showcases her chops on the offbeat Motown takeoff, "Down My Block."

The song "Patricia" provides a dual showcase for the band's musicianship.

First, the brothers Wilson exhibit their knack for visceral, gut-wrenching guitar work — trading lead riffs, the latter-day minstrels alternate between soaring abstract ax expressionism and just plain fretboard mayhem. As the guitar ax expressionism and just plain fretboard mayhem. As the guitar solos fade out, the entire band joins Wilson for a savage drum lashing.

Authors prepare plays for stage

Walden gets opportunity to direct; workshops help writers develop works

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

Most folks picture writing as a lonely, solitary task performed late at night in cheaply furnished rooms with a bottle of cheap liquor close by for inspiration.

For participants in K-State's creative writing workshops, which are offered by the English department for undergraduate and graduate students, the scene becomes a clean, well-lit classroom with seasoned instructors and peers to offer direction and support.

And in one of these classrooms in Calvin Hall last fall, playwright Wes Walden first read sections from a play that eventually became "The Vacant Lot."

Born in a playwrighting workshop led by Norman Fedder, professor of speech, the play will come to life in the Purple Masque Theatre this weekend.

Walden, graduate student in English, is also directing "The Vacant Lot," which is one of two plays from last fall's workshop to be a University production this fall. The other is "Any Day Wednesday," written by Steph Cox, which is now in rehearsal for a November production.

For the writers to bring in bits and pieces of the work to a weekly workshop forum and end up with a full production in only a year is an accomplishment in itself, but Walden is also taking on the duties of being the director.

Walden said directing his own work has been quite an experience. "It's changed my view of it somewhat," he said. "I've tried to treat it as someone else's work and not mess with it too much."

The real work of writing and re-writing, he said, was done last fall as the piece evolved and after a spring reading by the Playwrights' Stage.

The Playwrights' Stage was formed in spring 1990 to give playwrights on campus a forum for their work, especially for works produced in Fedder's workshops.

The works are featured in staged reading with little or no props, where the words, rather than the performance, retain the main focus in an effort to help the author hear his work in progress.

Walden said the workshop, which offers a perfect union between English and theater for writers interested in stage writing, is a big help in the writing process.

He said the workshop "helps the writer just see what kind of response you get. You sit at home, and you get so close to the work."

The comments and responses from other writers in the workshop and the audience, he said, also help writers.

But Walden said the ultimate challenge and thrill comes from hearing the work read aloud.

"We've been doing staged readings of Wes' work since Playwrights' Stage began," Steph Cox, graduate student in English, said. "It's rewarding — not only on an individual level, but also for the whole organization — to see original scripts receive a full production."

"The Vacant Lot" will be performed at 8 p.m. Friday and Saturday and at 2 p.m. Sunday in the Purple Masque Theatre.

'The Doors' explores Morrison's life, music

JENNIFER BEALS
A&E Writer

In an age of free love and peace, Jim Morrison carved an image and a lifestyle no one has been able to duplicate since.

"The Doors," starring Val Kilmer and Meg Ryan, is the story of the life and times of one of rock 'n' roll's most influential musicians.

school. This is when his creativity begins to flow.

As Morrison comes to grasp his talent, he meets the love of his life, Pam Courson (Ryan). Through their unique and erratic relationship, Morrison finds she is the only person who loves him for himself and not his image.

The plot of "The Doors" is not only bizarre but also unbelievable. It's not that the acting is terrible, but it's just hard to believe Morrison could indulge in the seemingly endless parties, drugs and booze.

Not only does he gratify himself with those luxuries, but he also indulges in dangerous women. One of his many women is a witch. By toying with his emotions, she leads him into sacred rituals and incantations.

"The Doors" is not only a terrific film but emotional one as well. It provides a shocking, inside look at the life of a well-known rocker and the life of a human being.

VIDEO REVIEW

The movie explores each facet of Morrison's bizarre and fascinating life from his childhood to his death. Director Oliver Stone ("Platoon," "Born On the Fourth of July") recreates a powerful and poignant look at one of the most unstable times in history in his own way.

As a young boy, Morrison's family comes upon a car accident on a southwestern highway. His eyes catch the gaze of a dying Native American whose spirit visits him throughout his life.

Later, Morrison leaves home for California and enters the UCLA film

Martin Scorsese directed this rockumentary, and the Band dubbed it "The Last Waltz." It is available on record and video.

Playing along with the Band during this event were some of the greatest influences in rock music — Van Morrison, Ringo Starr, Joni Mitchell, Bob Dylan, Neil Young, Eric Clapton, Ron Wood, Muddy Waters, Ronnie Hawkins, Paul Butterfield and Dr. John. And poet Lawrence Ferlinghetti showed up to read his "Loud Prayer."

Since that evening, Robertson had been doing film scores, including Scorsese's "Color of Money" with Paul Newman and Tom Cruise.

Robertson didn't release a studio album until 1986 when he collaborated with the BoDeans to make his self-titled solo debut, which included the songs "Showdown at Big Sky" and "Somewhere Down the Crazy River."

That album, which was his first real lead-vocal performance, won rave reviews in Rolling Stone and also sold well.

Six years later, Robertson now takes a different approach to "Storyville."

Throughout the Band's career, the group prided itself on diversity. Any album the Band put out could go from blues to country to cajun to folk to rock 'n' roll and back again.

Robertson takes a theme approach on this album. He mainly uses the theme of a town he fell in love with — New Orleans.

"Storyville" captures the essence of New Orleans with moody, sultry and steamy music, strong and poetic phrases, and references that definitely have a gumbo flavor.

On "Go Back To Your Woods," Robertson paints a vivid picture of the city.

"Hide in the bayou under the gun/ Been to the house of the rising sun/ Come down here trying to make a connection/Must have a bad sense of direction."

"Storyville" makes many nostalgic references to the street scene in big cities. The tune "Soap Box Preacher" deals with this descriptively by referring to the preacher missed any team workouts, sources said.

Snyder said Tuesday he saw no reason for Watson to not be ready against the Jayhawks.

Watson brings impressive statistics from the previous two games into the weekend. The senior completed 38 of 54 passes for 543 yards in games with Northern Illinois and Washington.

But Watson's counterpart, junior Chip Hilleary, has struggled thus far Slowed by the broken middle finger of his throwing hand, Hilleary completed just 41 of 79 attempts for 490 yards in KU's first three contests.

But recalling Hilleary's success in the win over K-State last season, Snyder expects Hilleary to be in top form Saturday.

"I remember last year that Chip had the same tag on him going into the game, and he threw for 221 yards," Snyder said. "I have real concern about Chip. I don't think what he's done in the past few weeks is going to have an impact on this game."

The primary weapon for the Jayhawks has been the running attack, particularly in the person of senior tailback Tony Sands. Having passed John Riggins and Gale Sayers for second on the school's all-time rushing charts in recent weeks, Sands is averaging 140 yards per game. The Cats held Sands to 48 yards last season and must contain him again to stay in the game.

"In three games against us, Tony has rushed for about 345 yards, and two years ago he broke two long ones that were the difference in the ball game," Snyder said. "I think he's a tremendously gifted back."

Snyder noted the importance of K-State establishing the ability to compete on the line with KU. The status of Gallon and blocking up front against the Jayhawk defense will be keys to the outcome, he said.

"I think they show real strength up front, both offensively and defensively," Snyder said. "They've been very good defensively against all aspects. Can we run the football against them? I'd like to think we have to be able to do that."

ated but need further attention. Chuck Werring, director of the Department of Housing and Dining Services, said extra amenities in the apartments were added at the request of those living there who are willing to pay more than those living in other buildings.

"Over a four-year period, the extra money allocated for these amenities will be returned through higher rent costs paid by tenants in William's Place," Werring said.

When asked if rent costs will have to be increased from the current cost to make up differences, Werring declined to comment.

Werring said the cycle of renovation is hard to break.

"To have to re-renoate already renovated apartments would be very costly. We are already fairly certain that we will not be renovating another building next fall in order to balance our budget again."

Werring said he realizes there are a number of non-renovated apartments that still need more attention, and it is difficult to keep up. He said the University doesn't always generate enough money for what needs to be done.

Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent for the housing department, said problems in renovating aren't as superficial as they may appear.

"Each year, we have tried to structure renovations of Jardine a little bit more. But detailed renovating means more time on the project, and people need places to live," he said.

Wiley said working with a limited renovation staff of six and occasional help from students during the summer also tends to make the process difficult.

People living in Jardine at the time of renovations also have to be placed in other apartments or move elsewhere, and housing, in turn, will lose more money.

Maintenance and renovations on campus are generally handled through housing maintenance. The only exception is other architects or contractors who are called in for certain projects.

The housing department is an auxiliary enterprise, which means all of the money generated through campus housing comprises the budget the department has to work with to complete renovations, maintenance and other projects.

Wiley said some future projects will have to be put on hold, and the University will have to try and maintain what it has until the loopholes can be worked out.

He also said the number of enrolled students and of those living on campus plays a large part in these decisions.

Problems with the budget this year have halted future projects and further renovations at Jardine. Wiley said reasons for the budget problems vary, but they can be attributed partly to the lack of reserve funds and campus maintenance problems that cost more than expected.

The reserve funds were tapped during the renovation of Strong Complex last year.

The housing department is also having to repay bonds that were floated during that time to complete the project.

"Everything we do comes out of the same housing fund," Wiley said.

He said part of the problem is they have projects already started that need completion despite the budget problems.

The new Jardine Community Building is an example of a project that was started but is still in progress.

The idea for the building was conceived about two years ago. It was then approved by the administration and the Kansas Board of Regents.

Outside contractors were hired to design the shell of the building — the roof, brick and stone — and housing personnel are working to complete the interior.

The estimated cost of the exterior is $180,000. Wiley said the project will hopefully be done by Christmas.

He said it is easy to anticipate the cost of things through experience, but unexpected emergencies sometimes come up and put loopholes in the budget.

Jardine offers housing options

Building renovated for unmarried, graduate, non-traditional students

By the Collegian Staff

A recently renovated building at Jardine Terrace Apartments offers housing options for unmarried, graduate and non-traditional students, as well as single faculty members.

Jardine typically houses married or single-parent students' families. Building F was renamed William's Place after William Jardine, a former K-State president.

According to a schedule set by the Department of Housing and Dining Services that began about 10 years ago, the building was next to be renovated.

The department began renovating two buildings per year until several years ago, when budget cuts and a decrease in enrollment allowed them to continue the renovation of only one building per year.

This year, however, renovation plans changed.

Chuck Werring, director of housing and dining services, said after he attended residence hall staff meetings and talked with graduate students, he found there was a need to provide a living option other than the dorms for the group Building F serves.

After Werring's staff discussed the demographics of the University and the need for attracting potential students, the Building F renovation was chosen for completion.

"I feel William's Place provides a supportive environment for the grad students. The building is in a convenient location, and the support system of those living around them is always accessible," Werring said.

The refurbished building, located across from Edwards Hall, is fully equipped with window air-conditioning units, wooden cabinets, dishwashers, microwaves and new carpeting. The two bedroom apartments also have ceiling fans in one of the bedrooms.

The other buildings at Jardine do not come this equipped, nor has their renovation been as extensive.

Despite the fact that William's Place tenants pay a higher rent cost, the extensive renovations have caused a great deal of concern among other Jardine residents.

Arturo Hernandez, graduate student in food science, lives in Building D, which was renovated several years ago. He said William's Place is definitely a lot nicer than everything else.

"My building isn't as nice as William's Place, but I don't pay as much, so I can't complain," he said. "Usually, you take what you can get anyway."

Hernandez said although his building was renovated once before, there are still things that could stand being renovated again.

There has also been skepticism that the renovation of William's Place was too extensive and should be utilized to house more families.

"I think allowing single people to live in a place that is traditionally for married people is inappropriate,"

Myron Schmidt, graduate student in chemistry, said.

Schmidt said he doesn't think it is fair that extra money was put into Building F while he was on a waiting list for an unrenovated apartment for his family.

Susanne Tunstall, family housing coordinator, said Jardine's capacity is at about 98.7 percent, and those on waiting lists have been placed.

"I think we have a fair system," she said. "We operate on a first-come, first-serve basis. It's true not everyone can always get the apartments they want, but we try our best to comply with everyone's choices."

Tunstall said some people just aren't interested in what they have to offer.

"I think William's Place was a good idea. There has been a definite need to house staff members, graduates and visiting scholars."

It is important, she said, to provide a place for these students — a place where they are around people who share similar interests.

Carolyn Coon, manager of William's Place, said she feels there was a definite market and a big enough demand for this kind of housing.

"It's affordable and in a good location. It is secluded, and the location is quiet," she said.

Other tenants said they found it unfair that family apartments weren't offered amenities as nice as those offered at William's Place.

But housing officials said they think the amenities were justified. Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent for the housing department, said wear and tear on apartments can be severe, especially among families.

Amenities were not added to discriminate against families already living in Jardine, Wiley said.

However, he said, it is probable apartments with single persons living in them can be more easily maintained in the future.

"Each group of people on campus has needs," Werring said, "and we're doing the best we can to provide lifestyle options for everyone."

BRIAN KRATZER/Staff

K-State Police Sgt. James Lehne radios for help as he hangs onto one of the two goal posts torn down Saturday after K-State beat KU 16-12. Lehne gave up the outnumbered struggle just beyond the parking lot east of the stadium, and the group carried the posts to Aggieville.

As the team and fans rush onto the field, K-State strong safety Greg Patterson falls to the ground in the north end zone in celebration after KU failed to score on the last play of the game.

Associates testify for Hill, Thomas

Hill passes polygraph test; results ruled inadmissible by chairman

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Four friends of Anita Hill solemnly testified Sunday she told them in the 1980s that Clarence Thomas had made unwanted sexual advances toward her. But former associates of the Supreme Court nominee vouched for him, one of them saying, "I know he did no such thing."

Offstage, a polygraph expert said Hill had passed a lie detector test, which her supporters said boosted her credibility.

And the Senate Judiciary Committee made public a statement from Angela Wright, who worked under Thomas at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Wright, who was dismissed by Thomas, said he "constantly pressured" her to go out with him, once asked her about her breast size and frequently made comments on women's anatomy.

"Clarence Thomas did consistently pressure me to date him," she said in the statement. "At one point, Clarence Thomas made comments about my anatomy. Clarence Thomas made comments about women's anatomy quite often."

She described one scene at a seminar when Thomas commented on the dress she was wearing and asked, "What size are your breasts?" Wright used an earthy colloquialism but later said that term was hers, not his.

In a long day and night under the television lights, the Senate Judiciary Committee heard sharply conflicting testimony about Hill and Thomas, accuser and accused in a drama that has captivated the nation.

"He wouldn't take no for an answer," Susan Hoerchner quoted Hill as saying about Thomas in the early 1980s.

Hill added that Thomas said, "You know if you had witnesses, you'd have a perfect case against me," Hoerchner told the panel, which is probing Hill's allegations of sexual advances and Thomas' unequivocal denials.

The lie detector test added an element of controversy. "Ms. Hill is truthful," said Paul Minor, test administrator and head of a private security firm in Virginia, in comments that sent consternation through the ranks of Thomas' defenders.

THOMAS HEARINGS

■ Hearings on Hill's allegations against Thomas of sexual harassment were concluded shortly after 1 a.m. today. No further testimony will be heard today.

■ Sunday, friends of both Hill and Thomas testified in support of both their stories.

Sen. Orrin Hatch, R-Utah, called the development "highly offensive and highly political, too pat, too slick, exactly what a two-bit, slick lawyer would do. Sen. Joseph Biden, the Delaware Democrat who chairs the committee, ruled the results inadmissible.

The Senate is scheduled to vote Tuesday on confirming Thomas, a 43-year-old black federal appeals judge whose nomination has turned into a tale of sex and politics unlike

Boren visits K-State

Confirmations weigh foremost on senator's mind

PAT OBLEY

City/Government Editor

Two confirmations and the CIA's evolution weigh foremost on the mind of third-term Sen. David Boren, D-Okla.

Boren will kick off this year's Landon Lectures at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium. He was interviewed at Manhattan Municipal Airport late Sunday evening.

As the longest-serving chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence, Boren leads the Senate confirmation hearings of Robert Gates for CIA director.

Shortly after he arrived at Manhattan Municipal Airport Sunday night, Sen. David Boren quipped, "I bet you guys had fun after you won."

Boren, D-Okla., was referring to K-State's 16-12 victory over archrival KU Saturday.

"I just got back from Dallas, seeing us lose for the third year in a row," Boren said of his favorite team, the Oklahoma Sooners, losing to archrival Texas.

While rooting during the game, Boren said his staff was taping the Clarence Thomas confirmation hearings so he could catch up on the latest developments.

Boren is in town to deliver a Landon Lecture at 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium. He is the 18th U.S. senator to be featured in the Landon Lecture Series on Public Issues.

When elected to his third term in 1990, Boren carried all but two of Oklahoma's 2,354 precincts.

He is renowned for being the longest serving chairman of the Senate Select Committee on Intelligence. In addition, Boren is a member of the Senate Finance and Agriculture committees.

Boren was elected governor of Oklahoma in 1974, becoming the youngest governor in the nation at the time.

DAVID BOREN

After graduating from Yale in 1963, Boren, a Rhodes scholar, went on to Oxford University for his master's degree.

After finishing his stint as chairman of the intelligence committee, Boren said he would like to focus on streamlining Congress.

"There used to be just 30 committees in Congress," Boren said. "Now, there are over 300. Congress just is not working."

"I would like to see a return to how Congress used to be."

After being so close to the intelligence community, Boren said he take so long to learn about the existing agency that it would take a long time to change?"

He said a willingness to effect change away from the "Cold-War mentality" is a must for the next CIA director.

"It's going to take a very knowledgeable, very strong leader to really change because the bureaucracy resists change, and the next director is going to preside over more changes than any director in the history of the CIA," Boren said.

"We're going to have to have a really massive reorganization of intelligence with all the changes in the world today," he said. "Over half the money and half the people were targeted at the Soviet military throughout."

Long lines, no riots in Aggieville after victory

Police say crowd a little quieter than expected; greater number of arrests made compared to past years

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Long bar lines were just about the worst thing faced by K-State fans in Aggieville celebrating Saturday's win over KU — a far cry from the riots of years past.

In fact, police said Aggieville was a little quieter than expected.

Sgt. K.W. Padgett, Riley County Police Department shift supervisor, said there were no big problems in Aggieville or Manhattan following the game.

"The department made approximately 191 arrests. This is a greater number of arrests than in past years,"

Padgett said. "This may be due to the larger crowd."

Police closed the entrances to Moro Street in Aggieville to vehicular traffic at North Manhattan Avenue and 11th Street. Officers posted at the entrances monitored people entering and leaving the area.

"There weren't any serious incidents," he said. "Everyone was getting along pretty well."

Padgett said the goalposts removed at the end of the game were recovered by police in Aggieville and returned to campus.

Officers were busier with a lot of noise complaints about private parties, Padgett said.

"Mainly, we were just busy with a routine calls," he said.

K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom said the crowd at the game was well behaved for its size. Homecoming game attendance was more than 40,000.

"We still had our usual run of alcohol-related problems," Beckom said.

However, Beckom said he thought the Aggieville crowd following the game was quieter than expected.

"It seems like everyone was in a pretty good mood, having a pretty good time," Beckom said. "I wasn't aware of anything major occurring."

Beckom said this year's Aggieville crowd was exceptionally good, compared to his past experience with post-game activities.

"This was the most cordial and easy-to-get-along-with group I've seen in a long time," he said. "It's about the quietest I've seen for a K-State-KU game."

Beckom said campus police calls were down compared to regular weekends.

Atchison County manhunt continues

ATCHISON (AP) — Authorities searched Sunday for a man who stabbed an Atchison County sheriff's deputy in a scuffle along a highway.

Sheriff Dennis Parker said Deputy James Helton, 26, was cut on the leg and right forearm but was not seriously wounded. Helton's protective vest kept the knife from cutting his stomach, Parker said.

The incident occurred at 8:05 p.m. Saturday when Helton offered to help a man who was walking along U.S. 59 in a rural area a few miles south of Atchison. When the man ran under a bridge, Helton got out of his patrol car and followed him, telling him to answer some questions, Parker said.

The man turned toward Helton and tried to slash his face. Helton blocked the move with his right arm and was cut, Parker said. The struggle continued for a few moments before the man broke free and ran away into a wooded area.

While officers from the sheriff's department and Kansas Highway Patrol helped Helton, a helicopter from the Topeka Police Department and a dog team from Lansing searched the woods for the man. The suspect remained at large Sunday afternoon.

Parker said Helton drew his gun after the man ran into the woods but decided not to fire because there were homes and businesses within range.

Dahmer more talkative while smoking

MILWAUKEE (AP) — A judge has ordered jail officials to relax cigarette restrictions for a man accused of killing 17 people because he seems more talkative with lawyers, investigators and psychiatrists when he can smoke.

Milwaukee County Sheriff Richard Artison objected to the order

Friday but said he will comply.

The jail forbids smoking by prisoners and employees as a fire-safety precaution. But Jeffrey Dahmer's lawyer, Gerald Boyle, and District Attorney E. Michael McCann agreed Dahmer is more talkative about the slayings when he can smoke.

Cannabis plants grown for many different uses

Washington cultivated hemp on his plantation

ULRIKE DAUER
Health/Science Writer

George Washington may not have smoked marijuana, but he cultivated the cannabis plant on his plantation in Mount Vernon.

Many people are surprised when they hear that marijuana, hashish and hemp all originate from the same plant, the hemp or cannabis plant.

DRUGS

Cannabis indica/sativa is a flowering sweet-smelling herb that looks a little like hops. Cannabis belongs to the same family as the stinging nettle.

What people usually call marijuana is a mixture of crushed cannabis leaves, flowering buds and small twigs.

Hashish is the resin the cannabis plant produces. Hashish usually is prepared by shaking, pressing and scraping the amber resin from the plant.

The difference between marijuana and hashish lies with the extraction process, said Ted Barkley, curator of the herbarium and professor of biology.

"Marijuana is extracted from the plant with dry low heat, hashish with fat," Barkley said.

The principle active compound of the cannabis plant is Tetrahydrocannabinol.

What is marijuana?

- Marijuana, hashish and hemp all originate from the hemp or cannabis plant.
- Cannabis indica/sativa is a flowering, sweet-smelling herb that looks somewhat like hops. It belongs to the same family as the stinging nettle.
- Common marijuana is a mixture of crushed cannabis leaves, flowering buds and small twigs.
- Hashish is the resin produced by the cannabis plant.

People in China, India and the Near East may know the most about marijuana. Cannabis has been used in Asian medicine and at sacred ceremonies for at least 6,000 years. The fiber also served as cordage, clothing and blankets.

Barkley said the cannabis plant is grown for the seed's oil in some areas.

He said cannabis oil was commonly used as lamp oil years ago.

In the 1960s and 1970s, cannabis became a popular symbol with the hippie counterculture. Its characteristic sweet aroma filled the air around marijuana smokers.

Used for its mood-altering potential, cannabis today is the leading psychoactive plant worldwide, followed only by tobacco and alcohol in popularity.

But cannabis also is and has always been an important cash crop.

It was vital to the shipping industry and plantation of the first colonies. The Pilgrims outfit their sailing fleets with sails and strings made from the cannabis fiber. And the pioneer wagons, covered by cannabis tarps, carried the crop west.

Cannabis became less valuable when steam power and the cotton gin were invented. After World War II, clothing and strings were manufactured from cotton and synthetic fibers rather than from cannabis.

The 1938 amendment to the Opium Narcotic Drug Act prohibited the cultivation of cannabis without special authorization.

Illegal cultivation of the cannabis plant flourishes today. How much actually is grown is difficult to know.

"No reliable figures are available," Barkley said.

The price paid for cannabis on the world market is usually high.

"The street price of a quarter of an ounce of marijuana is $40 right now," said Sgt. William Reece of the Riley County Police Department.

Reece said the price fluctuates with inflation like any other product.

Twenty years ago, he said, the same amount of marijuana only cost $5.

Boren

should lay in regional conflicts, economic sectors and "human source" intelligence, Boren said.

"Just because you have a great satellite photo doesn't tell you what Saddam Hussein's intention is," the senator said, "or what's going on in a little garage where some terrorist organization is making chemical weapons."

In order for the changes to be successful, new people with new expertise will have to be recruited, which is one of the reasons for a "no" vote on Gates, Boren said.

"It's going to be tough because here you've got some talented person whose been working for 20 years, and he speaks Russian, and he's a Soviet military and battlefield tactics expert," he said. "You can't transfer him over to the Middle East and tell him, 'Now you speak Arabic.'"

Boren described the turmoil over Clarence Thomas's nomination to the Supreme Court as tragedy for Thomas and University of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill, who has charged Thomas with sexually harassing her.

"I know Dr. Hill and her family, and I've known Judge Thomas somewhat, and I'm really impressed with both of these people," Boren said. "I think it's just a tragedy they've been thrust into the situation they are in now."

"My real anger is directed primarily at the people responsible for leaking this information to the press. It's a violation of the law to release an FBI report."

Because of the mishandled report, Boren says everyone involved in the confirmation has lost something.

"I have a real sympathy with Judge Thomas when he says 'Something has been taken away from me that no one can restore to me, and that's my reputation.'"

"I feel strongly that Professor Hill and Judge Thomas has been victimized by the process. I think the Senate has suffered greatly as an institution because of this. And I think the whole country has been damaged because, if the confirmation process is destroyed in this way, people are going to be very leery of accepting positions in the future.

"I think the FBI should be called in to investigate this leak. If a staff member or a senator is responsible, they should be held accountable."

Previously, Boren had announced he would be one of 14 Democrats to vote for Thomas' confirmation, but in light of recent events, he is now undecided and says he won't make a decision until the hearings are over.

"I do think we have to bear in mind that, under our system, a person is presumed innocent if there is any doubt that remains," Boren said. "I keep hoping there will be testimony that will nail us down one way or another, but there may not be. The witnesses for both sides seem to be very credible."

Victory Cats' purple pride shines on, off the field

Victory — how sweet it is.

Yes, the Cats downed KU for the first time since 1986 Saturday.

Just three short years ago, K-State fought to do anything right on the football field. Losses mounted, the stands were far from full and most of the jokes told in Big Eight Conference circles had a Wildcat punchline. But no more.

Now, for a year anyway, a few of the jokes told in these parts can have a Jayhawk punchline.

K-Staters can be proud of fan behavior at the game that showed a degree of class. Sure, there were the usual oranges that hit the field after a few K-State scores, and yes, the goal posts did come down. But the days of truly disruptive fan behavior appear to be over and gone with the childish riots that accompanied home games with KU in years gone by.

The fact that K-State came back from a nine-point deficit to win points to an increased maturity on the part of the players in the program. It's a maturity Snyder has insisted was there all along. Maybe now someone will believe he knew what he was talking about.

There is light at the end of the football tunnel for K-State, and everyone involved with what went on Saturday in KSU Stadium and in Aggieville has cleared away much of the debris of seasons past and made the sight of that light possible.

Congratulations, one and all.

Going to class means missing opportunities

Going to the Landon Lecture today?

Why not?

Oh, class.

Well then, remind your professor of the Provost's office recommendation that classes be let out during Landon Lectures.

And, remind him or her that one of the purposes of this august land-grant institution is to make us better citizens by educating us about the wider world.

Today's lecture by Sen. David Boren, D-Okla., would be a bad one to miss.

For one thing, Boren is one of the guys who's going to vote on Clarence Thomas' nomination Tuesday night.

And, he's the chairman of the Senate Intelligence Committee, which has been trying to decide if Robert Gates is qualified to be CIA director.

He is a player in two highly charged, highly controversial very, important nomination proceedings, and he's speaking here 10:30 a.m. today in McCain Auditorium.

Wouldn't it be nice if the administration — Wefald, not Bush — required that classes be let out during Landon Lectures?

Because, funny thing about education, it isn't always found in a classroom.

Columbus Day not holiday for everyone

It's all about attitudes.

Exactly one year before the 500th anniversary "celebration" of Columbus' discovery of North America, a grass-roots movement is trying to change the day's name and message.

Supporters seek to change the day to a "commemoration" rather than a celebration, which they say is a misnomer since Columbus Day is a day of mourning for Native Americans.

Supporters say they want to remind people Columbus was not the first explorer to visit the continent. He should be portrayed as the one who "brought two worlds into permanent contact" rather than as the discoverer of America.

This movement isn't about whether or not Columbus was a great man. It's about reading between the lines in history books and looking honestly at what his discovery has wrought during the last 500 years.

Respect and admiration should go out to those who are contributing to the movement. They are trying to modify people's attitudes. They are not trying to make everyone feel bad and guilty on Columbus Day.

Backers of the movement are trying to provide information that has been secondary in textbooks and, unfortunately, in most people's minds.

Critics will say they are just trying to stir up controversy and push anti-American rhetoric. But similar comments accompanied the uncovering of what really happened during the Vietnam conflict.

Some will say they should spend their time more productively and the name of a celebration does not matter.

But a decade ago, mentally and physically handicapped people were called retards and freaks. Obviously, names and labels have a lot to do with attitudes.

Sure, there are more pressing issues in the world, but every little bit of enlightenment helps.

All's quiet on the ~~KISS~~ front

Friend writes home from 'bootcamp'

ED SKOOG

I received the following letter from an old grade school buddy of mine. When he was nine, he ran away from home, lied about his age and joined the army. Not just any army — Vinnie joined the KISS army.

Now that I'm 21, I'd like to pretend KISS isn't important. But tell that to the hundred thousand KISS troopers, the kings of the nighttime world, those gods of thunder. Here is Vinnie's story.

"Dear Skoog,
"It is another quiet night here in the KISS barracks. Since General Gene 'The Demon' Simmons came last week for a surprise review, we've all just been cooling down. The general gave a speech from the reviewing stand which kinda bummed us all out. Well, it bummed me out, anyway.

"I've given 12 of the best years of my life to the service. Don't get me wrong. I don't regret one minute of it. But General Simmons is, well, he's my personal hero, you know? And to see him up there without his spiked demon boots, without his Gibson Grabber and without so much as a splash of clown white demon makeup — it was just lacking somehow like all the romance was gone.

"And what he said. He didn't even let the marching band finish 'I Want To Rock and Roll All Night.' He silenced them with a wave of his ungloved hand. Then he spoke.

"The Cold War is over. Disco's coming back. We haven't put out a good album since Dynasty. First the Catman split, then Ace left to do Frehley's Comet — what a bunch of crap. It's all crap. We're useless and weak," he said.

"He didn't even wriggle his tongue at us.

"The worst part, Ed, is that he was right. With the Soviet Union falling apart, the Mideast meeting to find a peaceful solution and Germany reuniting, we just don't have much to do anymore. We're left out of everything.

"We were in Iraq, but that Schwarzkopf fella forgot to send a Bradley for us. He apologized and said he'd call, but we never heard anything after that. My KISS platoon had to bum a ride back to Westbury with a van full of kids too young to know any KISS songs.

"I sang, 'Beth, I hear you calling, but I just can't answer the phone,' and the sergeant hummed along, but aside from that, there wasn't a sound. I shut up. The kids turned up the radio. Rush Limbaugh was talking about politically correct nurses. It was too much.

"There is no place left for us in the new world order. We needed the constant threat of Jackson Browne and Soviet nukes to survive. Recruitment is way down, and frankly, Ed, the new recruits are mostly drunks, 30-year-old computer programmers and librarians with worn-out Hush-puppies. We can't run an army on this weird fuel much longer.

"I'll be honest. I think I'm going to be retired soon. They've already moved me to a desk job. I won't complain. I know it takes nine KISS people to support one KISS soldier in the field.

"At my new job, I translate old KISS songs into English, so that they may be better understood by contemporary audiences. I also jot down in-house notation, to remind us of the chivalrous ideal for which we fight. Here's an example:

"I'm a dancer, a romancer (1)
I'm a Capricorn, and she's a Cancer. (2)

She saw my picture in a music magazine ... (3)

Baby, Baby take me down on my knees (4)

You can do what you please. (5)
C'mon and love me.' (6)

"1. Yes indeed, young Ace Frehley danced with Houston's cutting edge Ballet West for two years before becoming Space Ace.

"2. KISS was formed under the same Zodiacal sign as was Jesus Christ. The 'she' referred to is generally thought to be France, since Bastille Day falls within the Zodiacal sign Cancer. KISS has been at war with the Frogeaters since 1976.

"3. CREEM

"4. Notice the subtle repetition of the 'ee' sound — oh, those poets.

"5. One can hear the pain of life in the 'ou' sounds in this line. Ace sure has suffered for his art.

"6. This is the title. The Zen-like message of the song is often overlooked, but take the first letter of each word in this line, and it spells, 'CALM.' That's the sort of thing I do these days. It's important, sure, but it loses something in translation.

"Honestly, Ed, I can't see the KISS army holding together too long. The band's latest single, 'God Gave Rock 'N' Roll to You,' aside from the religious tint, distresses me. It just doesn't hit me the way new KISS songs usually do. I'm confused. Is KISS changing, or am I?

"I've also come to realize that General Simmons is really just plain butt-ugly without his makeup.

"I remain, Vinnie Vincent (no relation)."

Information on marijuana nonsense

Editor,

A front-page article addressing the effects of marijuana on the body was published in the Oct. 2 Collegian, and Stanley Konkright is quoted as saying, "It has been proven that marijuana is habit forming, and you have to wonder how they are getting the money to pay for it."

Well, Stanley, they would probably get the money to pay for marijuana from the same source you would get the money to pay for your beer and cigarettes. And what is this nonsense about habit forming? A habit can be anything — video games, reading, exercising or sex.

Konkright also informs us that this is a proven fact. I wonder where he got this fact; he does not give any credit to an author. Could it be that he made this fact up himself?

The Collegian also said marijuana is a gateway drug. The Collegian defines gateway drugs as "drugs that can lead to the abuse of harder drugs." There is absolutely no proof of this so-called "gateway" effect happening.

According to a study published in the May 1990 issue of "American Psychologists," people who totally abstain from any drug contact were "anxious, emotionally constricted and lacking in social skills compared with (occasional) experimenters."

The psychologists (Jonathan Sheldler and Jack Block of Berkeley University) who reported these findings also went on to say that while they do not advocate illegal drug experimentation, they indicate the practice may not be harmful. Other studies suggest marijuana is less harmful than legal drugs like alcohol and tobacco.

It's time we thought about the legalization of marijuana.

Fossil fuel editorial poorly researched

Editor,

Why does the Collegian save its most uninformed and poorly reasoned editorials for the section which is supposed to reflect a staff position? If I were on the staff, I would be embarrassed that readers might associate my name with Monday's inadequately researched editorial on fossil fuels.

For example, the anonymous writer described the K-State research vehicle as different from other vans because it runs on electricity. Then, making a tremendous leap in thinking, the author suggests this is proof we can stop using fossil fuels. Is the writer aware electricity requires other energy sources? In this country that means hydroelectricity, nuclear fission and fossil fuels.

What does it take to walk over to Farrell Library and do some reading about a topic before writing about it? It's what we expect of our composition students.

The problem is, except for the brief and sad attempt at political rhetoric, I agree with the editorial position. But the readers of a newspaper have a right to expect not only good writing skills, but also good thinking skills. It is not enough to just have an opinion — not when the goals are to inform a large number of people and to offer a forum for debate.

Pot potency article promotes myths

Editor,

I would like to comment on the Oct. 2 Collegian article regarding marijuana potency that only perpetuated the myths of marijuana and helped the government's propaganda machine that has kept marijuana illegal for so long.

Marijuana is one of the most innocent drugs. In proving this, I would like to point out the article's shortcomings.

Marijuana can be psychologically addictive, but so can tobacco and alcohol. In fact, alcohol and tobacco are also physically addictive — similar to cocaine, heroin and other narcotics. This means that when you stop using these substances, your body can go into withdrawal. This can result in nausea, seizures and death in extreme cases.

As far as marijuana being a gateway drug to harder drugs, that is merely circumstantial, and as such, I won't deal with it.

When it comes to Bill Arck likening the experience of smoking a joint to robbing a bank, I see no connection whatsoever. The only thing I can say is, Bill, aren't you stretching it a bit?

The article also included Don Mason, who sees the main difference between alcohol and marijuana abuse as "alcohol-related deaths are more frequent and more publicized."

Let me enlighten you, Don. Since you work at a hospital, you should know nobody has ever died from marijuana. In fact, according to government reports, it would take more than 1,500 pounds to overdose.

K-State, KU Fijis run for leukemia

Annual event has raised $173,000 in past 18 years

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Phi Gamma Delta members have raised about $173,000 for the Kansas Leukemia Society in the past 18 years from the Fiji Run for Leukemia.

This year's run started at 7:30 a.m. Friday at the University of Kansas Fiji house in Lawrence.

Jeff Fowler, K-State sophomore in park resources management, said about 45 K-State and KU Fijis participated in the run.

Michael Carson, freshman in chemical engineering, said he ran 10 miles during the day, and the amount members ran varied from five to 10 miles.

The run followed U.S. Highway 24 from Lawrence to Manhattan, ending at 5:30 p.m. Friday at the K-State Fiji house.

Before the K-State-KU game Saturday, Fiji members from both chapters presented a check for $23,000 to KLS representatives.

For the past five weeks, Fijis have gone door to door in the surrounding area collecting donations as part of the run effort.

Fowler said the run began in 1974 in memory of a fraternity brother who died of leukemia.

"I believe our fraternity will do this run forever," he said.

Carson said he participated in the run, because he liked to run and it was for a good cause.

Lack of sleep often problem for students

Disorders caused by academics, relationships

JANE ROESNER
Collegian Reporter

About 30 percent of all adults complain of not being able to sleep at night, said John Robertson, staff psychologist at University Counseling Services.

Although no studies have been done to determine the frequency of sleeping disorders among K-State students, they are not uncommon, Robertson said.

There are a variety of possible sleeping disorders — from narcolepsy (suddenly falling asleep) and sleep apnea (when breathing stops while sleeping) to insomnia.

He said the causes of these disorders are numerous and can be based on such things as a medical disorder, dietary intake or stress.

"Stress can certainly be a common one," Robertson said. "I don't want to minimize it, but there are other causes."

College students undergoing stress because of classes or relationships may develop insomnia or even begin to sleep for abnormally long periods in order to escape that stress, Robertson said.

There are four basic symptoms, Robertson said, that indicate a sleeping disorder: difficulty in falling asleep at night, difficulty in remaining asleep or waking up early, excessive sleeping or excessive daytime sleepiness.

Deciding when to be evaluated for a sleeping disorder is a subjective decision, he said.

"If they feel like their sleeping patterns are interfering with what's happening while they're awake," he said, "then they should come in."

Sleep disorders

- About 30 percent of adults complain of not being able to sleep at night.
- Lack of sleep is the most common sleep disorder among college students.
- There are four symptoms of sleep disorders:
 - difficulty in falling asleep at night
 - difficulty in remaining asleep or waking up early
 - excessive sleeping
 - excessive daytime sleepiness

Students who occasionally opt to stay up all night can recover relatively easily, but if skipping sleep becomes a regular activity, health problems could develop, said Leon Rappoport, professor of psychology.

Rappoport said the main concern with an all-nighter is a student will not eat healthily. That, along with lack of sleep, increases a student's vulnerability to sickness and stress.

He recommends eating carbohydrates or drinking orange juice instead of ordering out for pizza and a coke.

"Pizzas are not the ideal food," he said. "They'd do much better, although they'd never eat it, with oatmeal."

Lack of sleep is the most common sleep disorder among college students because of differing schedules for each day of the week, Rappoport said.

It is hard for students to get to sleep early the night before a 7:30 a.m. class if they were able to sleep until 9:30 or 10 a.m. the day before, he said.

Same story, new ending

SCOTT PASKE

Defense savors victory

"Goodness, I think this is probably the biggest win around here in a long time."

Right on, Rogerick Green. Simple, but true.

People often say, "This was the biggest," "This was the best," or "This was the greatest" after a win.

But throw a word like goodness and a sigh of relief in front of those phrases, and you've entered a new dimension. It implies realism. It separates itself from myth.

And the senior cornerback's analysis of K-State's 16-12 win over KU couldn't have come more directly from the heart. As he spoke, he took a personal journey through his career as a Wildcat football player.

"It may seem funny, but it's all starting to come to me now," Green said. "It goes back to when Coach (Bill) Snyder arrived here. He talked about things like team goals. He said to believe in yourself, never give up, things like that."

"A lot of us looked at each other and thought that was a little weird. But it was all so true today."

True enough for a win over the Jayhawks, the one elusive accomplishment of the K-State seniors.

Green and the rest of the defense granted quarterback Paul Watson enough reprieves to bring the Wildcats back in the fourth quarter. Because they were responsible, feelings ran deep.

It meant so much that nose tackle Evan Simpson cried. As he told his story, one of more than 40,000 that can be told, the words were choppy. Sentences were interrupted to wipe away the constant flow of tears.

There was nothing fake about it.

The images of a win that a team and its fans would have killed for were worth far more than the $20.50 ticket. There wasn't a place in KSU Stadium where a view was better or worse than another.

Maybe one.

The site of defensive end Elijah Alexander taken from the K-State locker room on a stretcher put a different perspective on the post-game celebration. While his teammates were outside watching students tear down the goal posts, Alexander collapsed in the locker room from exhaustion.

It prompted Snyder to travel to the hospital with his wounded warrior. An effort that typified the theme of a win required every ounce of Alexander's energy.

He was OK, but until that was learned, the incident tempered the Cats' level of excitement.

Still, at the moment the game's verdict was decided, the senses of sight and sound were priceless.

"I just fell to the ground," linebacker Chris Patterson said. "It was such a relief. We put so much into it."

"All I could think was we beat KU. We beat KU," Green said. "Time stood still."

And for once, it was K-State, a team that is vocal in its search for respect, that dictated the final outcome. So many times, the Cats have been pawns reacting to what an opponent offered.

That wrap has been slow in disappearing. It fueled a post-game tirade by Snyder toward the press and other comments from players.

"It gets old. It just gets so old," Patterson said. "Because KU was favored in the (betting) line, the fact that we beat them makes it a fluke. People don't think we can do anything for ourselves."

The Cats did Saturday. They created a magical moment for their fans.

Watson makes most of 2nd chance

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Quarterback Paul Watson needed only to look to the stands to understand how unlikely a fourth-quarter comeback seemed.

Pulled from the game after committing his fourth turnover, Watson's spot on the sideline was the perfect vantage point. From there, he could watch a portion of the 40,856 walk for the exits, counting on another chapter of the K-State-KU saga to be on its way to the presses.

Trailing 12-3 with 10:01 left in the final period, Watson watched his replacement, Jason Smargiasso, sail a pass into the hands of KU defensive back Robert Vaughn deep in Wildcat territory.

"K-State may have improved, but it's still K-State, and no one knows it better than the Jayhawks," was the unspoken message sent by exiting spectators.

That may have been the message, but the Wildcat defense wasn't listening. Starting on the K-State 15, the defense stopped three KU running plays to set up fourth and one at the 6-yard line.

"Our only thought was to get out of there with just a field goal," Coach Bill Snyder said. "A touchdown probably would have put us under."

That was precisely the logic that prompted KU coach Glen Mason to leave his offense on the field to drive the final nail into the K-State coffin. Mason's only problem was that KU running backs, who entered the contest averaging more than 250 yards per game, had been stuffed the entire day. To that point, K-State had held four KU backs to a combined 76 yards and had already stopped the Jayhawks on two fourth-and-one situations.

So KU opted to go to the air. Wide receiver Kenny Drayton gained a step on the defense and headed toward the left corner of the end zone. But Chip Hilleary's pass to seal the game floated just beyond Drayton's fingertips.

Snyder then went to the senior quarterback who hadn't seen the Jayhawks lose in his five-year college career. Watson took over at the K-State 6-yard line. Having completed just eight of his previous 21 attempts, Watson hit on eight of 11 passes to direct the Cats to KU's 10 in four minutes. On first and goal, Eric Gallon skirted the left end and broke two tackles to reach the end zone.

Round two of the coaching chess match found Snyder again calling on his defense. Trailing 12-10, with 3:58 on the clock, an onside kick seemed K-State's only hope.

"The thought went through our mind to onside kick it just so we would have a chance, because what happens if our defense can't hold them?" Snyder said. "But I went to our defensive coaches and said, 'I'll make that decision. You just tell me if you think you can get us three and out.' And by golly, they said they could, and they did it."

An incomplete pass and two short runs set up fourth and one for the fourth time. Mason wasn't entertaining any more thoughts of testing the defense, and he put the game back in the hands of Watson.

K-State's offense stalled momentarily at its 46 with 2:30 left. But on third and 12, Watson dropped a pass over the KU linebackers and into the

The Rodney Dangerfields of the Big Eight Conference now may finally get some respect.

And if K-State's football team doesn't turn a few heads during the next few weeks, it won't be because Wildcat coach Bill Snyder hasn't properly defended his team.

Fraught with emotion following what many termed the biggest win in the recent history of the program, Snyder tangled with a pair of representatives of state media outlets following the Cats' 16-12 win over Kansas Saturday in KSU Stadium.

His early answers to questions were terse. Then he hit a boiling point.

"Nobody has any respect for them," he began, voice quivering, eyes watering. "They can't climb out of a hole, they're still Kansas State, they're still a bunch of dogs. Nobody gives a hoot about 'em."

"We can't do anything, can we? I tell you what, if these kids are a bunch of bandits and a bunch of low-lives, and they don't go to class and don't do anything worthwhile, then rip their faces off."

"But, by golly, when they do something decent, give them some credit for it, will you?"

The mood in the pressroom was one of shock. Here was a man who had possibly just posted his greatest win ever as a head coach, and yet he appeared to be far from satisfied—at least with those gathered around him.

"I'm enjoying it," Snyder insisted. "I just don't always enjoy press conferences."

At the back of the room, several of Snyder's players, who were in the process of meetings of their own with the same men and women that Snyder had just lambasted, echoed the sentiments of their coach. They did it in different ways.

Rogerick Green took a brief chance to talk about some of those in the stands who also lacked in belief. "I actually saw people leave when it was 12-3," he said. "I started to laugh. These people are leaving, and we have eight or nine minutes left to play. I knew we could pull it out."

Huskers' McCant finds his targets

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Forty-one years ago, a Nebraska quarterback started the season by passing for 100 yards in his first five games.

Keithen McCant did it Saturday for the first time since.

McCant completed 17-of-19 passes for a career-high 231 yards and three touchdowns as the Huskers (4-1, 1-0) routed Oklahoma State (0-5, 0-1) in Stillwater.

"This is the best game of my life," said McCant, a fifth-year senior. "I called a lot of audibles, and they worked. But the trenches were what did it for us."

The Cowboys blitzed Nebraska continuously, but the Huskers handled the pressure.

"I think they geared their offense to take away some of the stuff that we have done to them defensively," Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones said. "We've played a cat-and-mouse game with them for a number of years on that kind of stuff. Obviously, sometimes they get us; sometimes we get them."

A year ago, an error by the officials gave Colorado an extra chance to score the winning touchdown against Missouri. The Buffs went on to the national championship.

No such help was needed Saturday in Boulder. Colorado (3-2, 1-0) took a 24-0 lead by halftime against the Tigers' (2-2-1, 0-1) porous defense and was never in trouble.

"Anytime they're moving the ball consistently with second- and third-team guys, it makes you wonder what is going on," Missouri cornerback Maurice Benson said. "It was just a matter of things snowballed so much. The score gets outrageous there after a while, and instead of trying to make plays, you start worrying about messing up."

Colorado gained 656 yards, 502 of them on the ground.

"We were so pumped up, we were overrunning plays, not really reading our keys at times," Benson said.

"We were just totally overplaying. Instead of getting outrun, we were overrunning. They cut back and we were arm-tackling, stuff we normally don't do."

In the annual game in Dallas, Texas handed Oklahoma its first loss on a fumble return for a touchdown.

Oklahoma missed three field goals, and the Longhorns' Bubba Jacques picked up a Mike McKinley fumble and ran 30 yards for the winning score early in the fourth quarter.

"The defense had to make something happen because our offense was having trouble," Jacques said.

Spikers win a pair at WSU Invitational

The K-State volleyball team is on its way up.

The Wildcats won two consecutive matches for the first time since early September at the Wichita State Invitational.

K-State opened the tournament Friday with a four-set win against the Washburn Ichabods 15-12, 9-15, 15-4 and 15-8.

The Cats beat St. Francis 15-8, 15-8 and 15-12 Saturday before falling to Wichita State 15-12, 15-7 and 15-11.

With the win over the Cats, the Shockers captured the tournament title by winning all three of their matches. K-State was second, St. Francis third and winless Washburn was fourth.

Before the opening match, Coach Patti Hagemeyer's team was unfamiliar with how Washburn would play.

It didn't matter. The spikers took control early and dominated the Ichabods throughout the match.

Angie McKee led the team with 24 kills and a hitting percentage of .564. Junior Kathy Saxton added 17 kills. On defense, senior Rhonda Hughes warded off Washburn's offensive attempts with 12 digs.

K-State continued its dominance Saturday against St. Francis, a team that entered the tournament with a 17-7 record.

Hagemeyer said she expected a strong offensive line from St. Francis, but the Cats overpowered their opponent, recording more kills and a higher attack percentage.

Saxton had 11 kills, and sophomore Stephanie Liester and McKee both had an attack percentage of .530.

Saxton and McKee were selected to the all-tournament team.

With the two wins, K-State improved to 8-12 overall.

K-State can edge closer to the .500 mark against Drake at 7 tonight at Ahearn Field House.

It will be the teams' second meeting of the season. K-State won a five-set match in Des Moines, Iowa, Sept. 5.

hands of tight end Russ Campbell, who rammed to the KU 34.

Needing at least 10 more yards to reach comfortable field goal range, Watson stayed with the pass. On second down, however, he was flushed from the pocket and chased to the right sideline. Just as it appeared he would tuck the ball away and turn it upfield, Watson spotted receiver Andre Coleman racing one step ahead of a KU defender at the 15. As he was hit from behind, Watson heaved the ball in Coleman's direction.

"I just wanted to get in his eyesight because I knew he was heading toward the sideline," Coleman said. "I thought it was going to be a jump ball because the defensive back was so close. But I think he lost focus on the ball."

Coleman ran under the pass with a step on the defender and raced untouched into the end zone. In just six minutes, the Wildcats had come back from virtual elimination to take a 16-12 lead. After his fourth-quarter return, Watson was 10-of-15 for 146 yards.

With 1:58 remaining, the defense was called upon once again to save the game. The Jayhawks mounted a desperation drive that brought them to the Wildcat 10. Officials stopped the clock with one second left, forcing the exhausted defenders to hold for one final play. But the clock was restarted, and a pass broken up by Rogerick Green in the corner of the end zone would not have counted.

"There wasn't anybody fresh in that fourth quarter. I can assure you of that," Snyder said. "But freshness in the fourth quarter, to me, is attitude. We had kids that were going all out all day, and they rose to it again at the end."

Snyder said K-State's defensive effort was probably the best in his three seasons as head coach. KU managed 331 yards, but running back Tony Sands, who had rushed for more than 100 yards in each of the Hawks' four previous games, gained just 29. The KU offense was stopped repeatedly, both on the ground and in the air.

"Everybody wanted it on every snap. You could see it in everybody's eyes coming down to the end," free safety Jaime Mendez said. "It's our job. If there is a fire, we're the firemen, and it's up to us to put it out. Every time we had to come in with our backs to the wall, the momentum just kept building."

the team late, wanted to make sure upon his re-insertion that his teammates believed what Snyder had told them all along — they were capable of coming back at any time against any opponent.

"When I went back, I said, 'Fellows, this is what we've been waiting for.' We had faith we could go down and score the second time."

Wide receiver Michael Smith may have summed up the feelings of his teammates and coaches best. And his sentiments were fairly simple.

"We had a bunch of guys who wouldn't quit today. We did everything wrong, everything possible to lose a game," he said. "But we have a great senior class, and we have some young guys who won't give up."

Golfers finish 7th

Women end fall season, place 2 among top 10

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

In the normally unmemorable portion of the golf season — the fall semester — the K-State women's golf team has added another accomplishment to its lengthy list.

And the Wildcats did so despite a less than impressive seventh-place showing at the 12-team Hawkeye Invitational in Iowa City.

The accomplishment, which occurred in 40-degree weather and heavy winds, was defeating the traditionally competitive Hawkeyes on their home course, the Finkbine Golf Course.

K-State's score — 337-331-334-1002 — was the second time the women have failed to keep their score under 1000 since Mark Elliott became K-State's coach. Elliott moved into the head coaching position at the start of this year.

"It was just tough, tough conditions," Elliott said. "We didn't play well, but we've had a good fall."

"Our 12th-place finish against a quality field at Iowa State was good. Our third-place finish at the Roadrunner Invitational in Las Cruces, N.M., was an accomplishment and certainly our championship at Wichita State fits and was a step in the right direction. I feel like beating Iowa on their home course fits right in that category."

Individually, the Cats were paced by junior Valerie Hahn and senior Adena Hagedorn. The two tied for eighth overall. Hahn continued her machine-like consistency by shooting 82-80-81-243, while Hagedorn overcame a poor first round and turned in two of the lowest rounds of the tournament, 87-77-79-243.

"We really feel like a tie for eighth for them was really good," Elliott said.

K-State's other finishers were junior Theresa Coyle 84-86-86-256, sophomores Denise Pottle 88-91-90-269 and Julie White 93-88-88-269 and freshman Jacques Wright 84-89-104-277.

Chiefs bully Dolphins 42-7

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Everybody lauded Chris Martin for making the play of the game except Chris Martin, who at least admitted he had never run farther with a recovered fumble.

But in the history of the NFL, only one guy has. Martin's 100-yard fumble return gave Kansas City a 14-0 first-quarter lead and set the tone Sunday for a 42-7 rout of Miami, the third-worst defeat in Dolphins history.

"The play of the game, a 14-point swing, was the fumble and the 100-yard return," said Coach Marty Schottenheimer, whose Chiefs (5-2) took a half-game lead over idle Denver in the AFC West. "They were going in to tie it, and the next thing you know, we're up two touchdowns.

That was obviously the play of the game."

Steve DeBerg threw for three touchdowns, and Christian Okoye rushed for 153 yards and two touchdowns as the Chiefs followed Monday night's 33-6 belting of the previously unbeaten AFC champion Buffalo Bills by handing Miami its worst loss since a 35-0 blanketing at Baltimore in 1970.

"That's about as bad as I can remember any football team I've been associated with getting beat," Miami coach Don Shula said.

"If we play ball the way we're capable of playing, then we're capable of great things," said Todd McNair, who scored the Chiefs' fifth touchdown.

After a 68-yard, all-Okoye touchdown drive on Kansas City's first possession, Dan Marino passed the Dolphins smartly down field to the Chiefs' 2. But Sammie Smith fumbled at the 1-yard line and Martin, a 240-pound linebacker, scooped up the ball in the end zone.

Lloyd Burruss blocked the only Dolphin with a chance at making the tackle and Martin romped 100 yards for the longest fumble return since Jack Tatum went 104 yards for Oakland against Green Bay in 1972.

"I think that was a major factor," Martin said of his play. "But so many people played well all day — the linemen, the receivers, the running backs. I scored the touchdown, but there were so many other guys involved in this win."

It was a rematch of last year's AFC wildcard game, which Miami won 17-16.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
SCENETiming made discovery vital*DAVID BULLOCK

Next year is the quincentennial of an epic voyage. Nearly 500 years ago, Christopher Columbus sailed from Spain to what the Europeans would eventually call the "New World."

The celebrations have already begun. Merchants and mail-order catalogs are hawkking books, games, coloring books, coins, medallions, puzzles and toy ships decked in the Columbus logo.

Full-scale replicas of his vessels — the Nina, the Pinta and the Santa Maria — have been constructed, then sailed along the same route purportedly taken by Columbus on his first voyage of discovery.

NOW AND THEN

A TV miniseries has examined the world Columbus lived in and the legacy he left behind.

Certainly, the monies spent on these products and events have exceeded the funds tendered by the monarchs of Spain to launch this historic odyssey in the first place.

Columbus, in fact, did not really "discover" America. Immigrants from eastern Siberia, who had begun to settle the "Americas" approximately 30,000 years ago, had already done that. Some scholars and many more charlatans have put forth claims that Egyptians or Phoenicians or Greeks or Romans had some limited contact with the New World, but no evidence has been accepted as proof.

It has been proven, however, that Viking sailors from Scandinavia crossed the northern Atlantic to Newfoundland in eastern Canada around A.D. 1000. Yet while they beat Columbus by nearly 500 years, their settlement was only temporary and seems to have had no impact on subsequent exploration or on the people already living in the Western Hemisphere.

If European society had not been in an important state of flux when Columbus sailed, his trip would have had no more significance than the voyage of the Vikings. The new driving forces were economics and politics.

Economically, the Europeans desperately needed spices for medicines and the preservation of meat. Spices such as pepper, cinnamon and nutmeg could be used to pay taxes or buy land, and cloves were literally worth their weight in silver.

Europeans also needed gold to fuel the new "money" economy, which was beginning to replace the old manorial system of the Middle Ages. Both spices and gold lay in rich abundance in the exotic East.

Politically, the 15th century was also a time of change. Nation-states arose from the decentralized chaos of feudal times. King Ferdinand of Aragon and Queen Isabella of Castile united their crowns and forged the foundation of modern Spain. And they had the vision to listen to an unknown, would-be explorer named Christopher Columbus.

Columbus was born in the Italian city-state of Genoa in 1451. Genoa was a city of merchant seamen-adventurers whose most lucrative enterprises were the acquisition and sale of gold and white slaves.

From an early age, Columbus had been accustomed to ships — not only as a deckhand, but as a traveling sales representative, a navigator and a captain. To these experiences he added a doggedly determined personality and wide scope of vision.

He did not lack the flair of the extraordinary entrepreneur. When he sailed with the blessing of Ferdinand and Isabella, he was given the title "Admiral of the Ocean Sea," "Viceroy" of the lands he would claim for Spain and the right to a 10-percent cut of the profits.

In all, Columbus made four trans-Atlantic voyages, yet he died insisting he had found the Orient.

If he had been able to relinquish his dream and realize he had, in fact, introduced the Europeans to a "New World," we might be called "Columbia" today.

But as history has it, Italian navigator Amerigo Vespucci made famous the notion that Columbus had sailed not to the Orient, but to a separate mass of land. For that reason, we are called America.

'Vacant Lot' truly theatrical Creativity brought to local stage by student playwright

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

"The Vacant Lot," a play written and directed by a K-State student, offers local audiences a truly out-of-the-ordinary theatrical performance.

With most of the productions on campus leaning toward rehashes of tired and unimaginative, but popular, fluff, an experimental play like "The Vacant Lot" is welcome indeed.

It is truly exciting to finally see some University talent get a forum for their works on campus. This year, a number of student works will be presented through the Playwright's Stage in full production.

In a relatively short run — Friday, Saturday and Sunday — "The Vacant Lot" offered some of the sanest, safest and most creative entertainment in town for a crazy weekend.

Complex and experimental, the play is difficult to explain in a condensed version because it sometimes gets muddled. The action involves the Buck family, which offers a delightfully dysfunctional portrait of all that is wrong with modern life.

Robert is a harried businessman, and Mary, his long-neglected wife, longs for the closeness they once knew. Daughter Julia, the most dysfunctional of the trio — simply because she also is a blossoming 20-year-old exploring her sexuality — is so troubled it seems she could fill the entire two hours herself.

Add to that a "whisper" and intervention from spirits not of this world, and you have a spicy, jumbled gumbo of action on the stage, taking place on so many levels that it is sometimes hard to keep track.

Robert, played by Aaron Bisel, has been visited by "the whisper" at two times in his life when he has done something truly wrong and, in this case, deceitful — lying on a business deal.

The spirits, who only appear to Robert and are played by LaFern Watkins and Eric Hunley, are sent to Earth to "shake things up," and that they do.

The play is filled with wonderful images of fruit trees that blossom but never bear fruit and are eventually cut down because of Robert's greed. Walden works hard to give the audience something tangible that helps keep the crazy Buck family's problems real by creating parallel images between fruit trees and long-dormant tomato seeds and Julia's new-found, "gushing" sexuality.

Sometimes, "The Vacant Lot" offers the same temptations as that blossoming cherry tree — blossoms that offer only the promise of fruit. With a little more character development and a little depth beyond the convenient symbols that Walden uses well, but in excess, this could have been an even more outstanding experience for the audience.

There is a lot of symbolism in the play — maybe too much at times — but possibly that makes it accessible to all audiences. Watkins and Hunley, for example, who are both good and evil, are dressed in stark white or black. Robert's wife, played by Leslie Seaton, is always dressed in green, symbolizing the priority they place on money and the growth that

'M. Butterfly' coming to Manhattan

Award-winning Broadway play at McCain Tuesday

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

David Henry Hwang's "M. Butterfly," the 1988 Tony Award-winning play, will be performed Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

The play's appearance in Manhattan is part of its current tour of the United States and Canada.

The action takes place in a Paris prison, and, in flashbacks, the years 1960-1986 in Beijing and Paris.

The plot is based on an actual 1986 international news story in which a French diplomat stationed in Beijing took a star of the Beijing Opera as his mistress.

Only after they had been together for many years — when both of them were arrested in Paris and charged with being spies for Communist China — did he find out that she was really a man.

"M. Butterfly" has sometimes been accused of being an anti-American play, a diatribe against the stereotyping of the East by the West, of women by men, Hwang said in a news release in the play's packet.

"Quite to the contrary," he said according to the release, "I consider it a plea to all sides to cut through our respective layers of cultural and sexual misconceptions."

Graeme Malcolm plays the role of French diplomat Rene Gallimard. Malcolm has appeared in numerous New York and regional productions including the Broadway companies of "Sherlock's Last Case and Benefactors," as well as "Educating Rita" at the Phoenix Theatre, and "Prin and Aristocrats" at the Manhattan Theatre Club.

Francis Jue plays Song Liling, the Beijing Opera star. Jue won San Francisco's Bay Area Critics Award for performing in "Pacific Overtures."

"M. Butterfly" is Broadway's longest-running play since "Amadeus."

A story so bizarre it could only be true.

For 20 years a French diplomat had an affair with a Beijing opera star, who presented him with a child as a memento. But the diplomat's butterfly turned out to be quite different from the Cio Cio San of Puccini's Madama Butterfly. In this fascinating tale, David Henry Hwang takes a look at how the East and West misperceive each other and how the relations between the sexes have changed. Winner of the 1988 Tony Award for Best Play.

"Bold, intensely dramatic, thought-provoking, and stunningly presented, M. Butterfly is a play I promise you will never forget." (Newhouse Newspapers)

Disturbed sleep patterns, waking up five or six times during the night and bad dreams also contribute to lack of sleep. Rappoport said this leads to deterioration of motor skills and the ability to concentrate.

He said there is a theory that if someone stays up for more than 72 hours, there will be a biochemical effect which ultimately leads to death.

David Danskin, retired staff psychologist for University Counseling Services, developed a brochure outlining recommendations for getting a good night's sleep.

Danskin suggested exercising regularly, setting a bedtime schedule, taking a warm bath and keeping the bedroom cool. He also said writing down a "to do" list makes it easier to stop worrying and fall asleep.

"We're learning how to be satisfied with what we make, like a good album," he said. "I'm not complaining."

And should Trip Shakespeare make it to the year 2010 or 2020, Wilson said with a laugh that he'll probably be around.

The band's set included a wide variety of songs from its five-year career with an emphasis on 1990's "Across the Universe" and the recently released "Lulu." The band even included one song destined for its next album — a sweet tune filled with erotic metaphors titled "Trumpet in a Lonely Store."

The oft-requested "Toolmaster of Brainerd" played at the set's end and was clearly the crowd favorite.

The exhausted fans might have left Liberty Hall with hearts and minds conquered, but they loved it.

any other. Sen. Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., predicted that most of Thomas' previously announced 13 Democratic supporters would stand by him unless something "really heavy" came up before the end of the hearings.

Biden held out the prospect of an all-night session to hear from each of the numerous witnesses scheduled to testify, and he said Hill and Thomas would be invited back to close out the proceedings on Monday.

Far from the crowded committee room, President Bush issued a fresh defense of his embattled nominee. "I believe he will make it," the president said before heading off to the golf course.

Thomas and Hill aside, the day's drama demonstrated that sexual harassment knows no favorites. One witness for him and one for her disclosed that they, too, had been victimized.

"Being a black woman, you know you have to put up with a lot," Ellen Wells told the committee of 14 white male senators. "So you grit your teeth and you do it," she said, adding that she had been "touched in the workplace" more than once.

The contrast in testimony was striking.

Hill "said that Clarence Thomas had repeatedly asked her out," Hoerchner said. "She told me that of course she had refused, but he wouldn't take no for an answer."

Hoerchner said Hill told her Thomas repeated his entreaties, saying "I'm your type. I'm your kind of man, and you refuse to admit it."

More than six hours later came an entirely different story, one depicting Thomas as a man completely incapable of such action — and Hill as anything but a meek victim.

"I know he did no such thing," said Nancy Elizabeth Fitch, a former assistant to him at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. "I trust Judge Thomas completely."

J.C. Alvarez, another former aide to Thomas, called Hill opinionated, arrogant and aloof, and said her former boss was being "mugged in broad daylight."

Phyllis Berry Myers, another aide, said "Never has anyone raised allegations such as Anita has."

Several senators asked if Hill had a romantic interest in Thomas. Fitch said no, but Myers said yes. Sen. Alan Simpson, R-Wyo., stressed that although Hill made numerous calls to Thomas after the alleged harassment, they stopped when she learned in the fall of 1987 that he had gotten married.

Lot

"The Vacant Lot," as Watkins' character explains, is about "what you can lay your hands on and what you cannot." Sometimes, maybe the difference between the two is not clear, both onstage and in real life.

With unconventional staging and a tricky script, Walden takes the hard road to making his point, but he does get his point across.

In a college community, it is a shame there are not more opportunities for student playwrights and directors to hone their skills and test the waters in front of real audiences. Maybe the success of productions like "The Vacant Lot" will open doors for other artists.

Senator

"I would really like to help preside over the revolutionary changes that will be occurring in the intelligence community."

Beyond that, Boren is mum on future ambitions, including the presidency.

"I think it's probably better, for my timing, that I not consider 1992," he said of running for president. "Some day, maybe in the future."

For now, Boren had more important questions in mind.

"Did they tear the goal posts down after the game?"

Autumn is characterized by trees changing colors and losing their leaves. However, due to less rain this summer and cold temperatures earlier this fall, few trees in the Flint Hills area have exhibited vibrant colors.

Fall colors may not be as bright, just brown

Lack of rain left trees malnourished but lack of winds, freezing temperatures may help colors appear

People may spend this fall raking up a bunch of plain brown leaves. This year, due to drought and fluctuating temperatures, leaves may not change in color, and if they do, the colors may not be as vibrant as they normally are.

The lack of color displayed this fall, according to Peter Wong, professor of biology, is due to the lack of rain this past summer. When a drought occurs, the trees are not able to produce the amount of needed nutrients to keep the chlorophyll or green color alive. When the chlorophyll begins to break down early, the fall pigments are synthesized to help aid the plant in collecting energy to produce necessary nutrients.

When the fall pigments are used by the trees early, the color is masked. Such colors as the anthocyanins, which are the reds and purples, and the flavones, which are the shades of yellow, may not show up.

Wong said in order to have a vibrant yellow, red or purple, the plant must have excess sugar, plenty of light and cool temperatures. The preferred temperatures are between 40 and 60 degrees.

But Jim Nighswonger, professor of forestry, says that no one actually knows the process of the trees' leaves changing color, but some have a pretty good idea.

Nighswonger said this year, trees that normally do not show that much color change are turning to shades of yellow. The days' length is the most important factor in leaves

Senate to vote on Thomas 5 p.m. today

White House strategy focuses on Southern Democrats

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Supporters of Clarence Thomas worked Monday to preserve Senate support for his Supreme Court nomination as senators "pained and perplexed" by sexual harassment allegations decided how to vote.

A key Southern Democrat, Sen. J. Bennett Johnston of Louisiana, reaffirmed his support for Thomas, saying the allegations by University of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill had not changed his mind about the nomination.

"I believe Judge Thomas is qualified. I said so two weeks ago. I know nothing that has transpired in the meantime to take away from that," said Johnston.

Another former aide to Thomas, Sukari Hardnett, told the Associated Press that black women in his office at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission felt they were objects of his sexual interest and physical inspection.

"I am generally undecided," said Sen. J. James Exon, D-Neb., who had been a Thomas supporter before Hill's allegations surfaced.

"I was so disturbed over the events this weekend that I'm literally, entirely in the undecided category," said Sen. Christopher Dodd, D-Conn., who had previously been leaning toward Thomas, said at a news conference Monday in Hartford, Conn.

"I'm as pained and perplexed as the rest of America," said Sen. Joseph Lieberman, D-Conn. said on NBC, who had originally been a Thomas supporter. "It's quite possible that we're not able to decide that anybody is lying."

Thomas would have 52 votes, barely a majority, if 41 Republicans and 11 other Democrats stick with pledges of support made before Hill's allegations surfaced.

Sen. Dennis DeConcini, D-Ariz., another Thomas supporter, predicted the Senate would approve the nomination in a vote that both sides expected to be close.

Sen. Sam Nunn, D-Ga., said Monday in remarks to the Atlanta Rotary Club that he would "review all the evidence tomorrow before making my final decision, but at this stage I continue to support Judge Thomas." He said men must become more sensitive to the problem of sexual harassment in the workplace.

The vote was scheduled for 5 p.m. CDT today after eight hours of time for debate.

"This is a cliffhanger if there ever was one," said Nan Aron, executive director of the anti-Thomas Alliance For Justice.

"I believe Clarence Thomas. The American people believe Clarence Thomas. I have no idea where the votes are," said Sen. John Danforth, R-Mo., the nominee's mentor and champion on Capitol Hill.

President Bush said support for Thomas was still "holding strong" despite the explosive allegations of Hill.

"I am very pleased with the way support all across the country is holding strong for Judge Thomas," Bush said, referring to a flurry of last-minute public opinion polls showing Americans believed Thomas' firm, flat denial by roughly a 2-1 margin.

Threats painted on sidewalks

BaGaLs slogans advertising Coming Out Day lead to anti-gay messages

TRISTAN MOHN
Staff Writer

Walking to a meeting early Friday morning, two faculty members noticed anti-homosexual messages written on campus sidewalks.

"I call them terroristic statements," said Susan Scott, associate dean of student life and one of the faculty members who reported the messages to Facilities.

They were written next to messages chalked by members of the Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian support group, said Kevyn Jacobs, freshman in arts and sciences and a member of the club.

Since Friday was National Coming Out Day, Jacobs said the group chalked the messages Thursday night suggesting people wear blue jeans Friday in support of gay and lesbian rights.

"Apparently, we caught someone wearing blue jeans, and they were rather unhappy about it," Jacobs said.

Many of the BaGaLs slogans were defaced by people who tried to scuff them out, he said. But in these two instances, he said someone wrote "fags must die" beside the messages.

Jacobs has since received the same message on his answering machine and has stopped answering his phone.

"Someone will call and say 'fags must die' and hang up," he said. "This attitude is rather childish."

He said he didn't know if the phone calls were from the same person who wrote the message on the campus sidewalks, or if the caller is just a copycat.

"That's one reason why people are afraid of using their full name, because they might get harassed in this manner," he said.

Scott said she didn't think the BaGaLs' messages on the sidewalks were pushy or forward, just informative.

Bernard Franklin, assistant dean of student life, the other faculty member who reported the slogans, said these actions are unacceptable.

"That is not an acceptable way of handling frustrations," he said. "We abhor that. There is no place for it at

Sen. David Boren says citizens must change with the times

Being aware of history-making world events can be America's biggest asset as its people plot the country's course into the future, said Sen. David Boren, D-Okla., during his Landon Lecture Monday in McCain Auditorium.

"Few people have had the privilege of living through great moments of change in history with the full knowledge that they have a unique chance to help shape a better world," Boren said.

"Unlike those who lived through periods like the Industrial Revolution and the Renaissance, which were recognized only afterward as history-making events, we know that we are living through a moment of such intense change that the world stands at a crossroads."

Four fires were intentionally set Monday afternoon northwest of Sunset Zoo.

B Division Battalion Chief Charles Tannehill of the Manhattan Fire Department said there were several spots where someone had lit a pile of twigs on fire. "Due to the proximity of the high school and the time when the call came in, I can definitely say the fires are not due to circumstances," Tannehill said.

The grass fire burned about an acre of land and caused no serious damage, he said.

"Basically, it burned grass and dry leaves," he said.

Zoo Curator Mike Quick said he originally thought the fire had started from spontaneous combustion because of heat caused by

28 alleged Iranian druggies executed

NICOSIA, Cyprus (AP) — Twenty-eight alleged drug traffickers were executed Monday in Mashhad, capital of Iran's southeastern Khorasan province.

The Islamic Republic News Agency, monitored in Nicosia, said the executions brought the number of people hanged on drug charges in Khorasan since last March to 152. It said that of those executed Monday, the youngest was Mohammad Omran, 21. It identified the eldest as Alam Barahouie, 61. Four were women.

Two were Afghans, it said. Possession of even small quantities of drugs like heroin carry a mandatory death sentence under Iranian law.

Opposition groups charge that political prisoners are being executed under the guise of drug-related crimes.

Swaggart to step down from Ministry

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — Jimmy Swaggart is stepping down from the leadership role in his worldwide ministry following allegations he picked up a prostitute, an official in Swaggart's organization said Monday.

J.R. Heisch, administrator of the Family Christian Academy, which is operated by Swaggart's Baton Rouge church, said the evangelist's son, Donnie Swaggart, will assume leadership of Jimmy Swaggart Ministries.

The 56-year-old Swaggart will "step down at least temporarily. Until Brother Swaggart gets back on his feet," Heisch said.

Calls to Jimmy Swaggart Ministries for comment from the Swaggarts went unanswered late Monday. William Treeby, an attorney for Jimmy Swaggart Ministries, refused earlier in the day to comment on rumors that Swaggart was stepping down.

Rosemary Garcia, 31, of Indio, Calif., said she was with Swaggart when he was stopped by a police officer Friday and cited for traffic violations there. Garcia said afterward that she is a prostitute, and "he asked for sex."

Swaggart was not charged with any sex-related offenses.

University coverage to be explored

Publicity and its side effects are the topics of the first general meeting of the Faculty Women's Caucus, which will be from noon to 1 p.m. today in Union 213.

Speakers will include Cheryl May, director of News Services, and Kay Garrett, associate director. Both handle public relations for the University and media inquiries for students and faculty.

Their topic is "The Publicity Pill: Good for You, Good for the University, but sometimes Hard to Swallow."

May said they will address the advantages and disadvantages of media coverage of faculty members.

"There are a number of professors that are well recognized in their fields of study and are called daily by the media about the research they have done."

She said the coverage is "hard to swallow" because it takes time away from other obligations.

Garrett said they will also discuss how more media coverage can be given to women professors and their research projects.

"There is a big push to increase the number of women in math and science," Garrett said. "We want to encourage undergraduates to stick with it."

This will be the first of several meetings designed to improve conditions for women at K-State.

Variety changes Homecoming

New focus includes more alumni, campus organizations

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

More focus on alumni and campus organizations other than greeks was the goal of the Alumni Association for this year's Homecoming.

This was the Association's first year of being in charge of the week. Blue Key, a campus honorary, has done it in the past.

One of the Association's goals was to bring alumni back to K-State for the game and festivities.

The colleges of Architecture and Human Ecology added alumni get-togethers as did several groups and honoraries on campus. The Association also encouraged departments to expand on the College of Agriculture's traditional Ag-round-up, a reunion of agriculture graduates.

"We think the most important fact about Homecoming is the alumni," said Amy Renz, Alumni Association assistant director.

She said the Association aimed to continue past activities as well as add new ones.

By enlarging the board which organized and planned the week, the Association widened the scope of Homecoming, trying to include the whole campus, not just the greek organizations, Renz said.

Students from the Multicultural Student Council, the Christian Student Organization and the Engineering Council joined the Panhellenic Council, Intrafraternity Council, residence hall, Student Alumni Board and student government representatives.

"We felt we had a very good cross-section of the student body and that we involved students from different areas that were not involved in the past," Renz said.

While Blue Key opted to begin a leadership program rather than coordinate Homecoming, the honorary planned the bonfire on Friday night.

"While there's a lot to do with planning Homecoming, you don't take a lot of that (new skills) with you when you leave the University," said Assistant Dean of Student Life and Blue Key adviser Bernard Franklin.

He said Blue Key members thought they could maximize their skills by adopting the leadership program.

"There's no real learning opportunity in planning Homecoming," he said.

consideration for this nomination.

"Do you realize that just during the course of this confirmation, the entire Soviet Empire has collapsed?"

Boren said since the beginning of the Cold War, world leadership has been defined in military terms. Because of this, the world was willing to follow America's lead because it needed protection from Communism and the Soviet Union. But now, he said, that time has passed.

"One of the things we have to learn is to change our thinking to coincide with the world around us," Boren said.

"People always ask me what the biggest threat is to our national security, and I always say the biggest threat is that we will not change our thinking fast enough to keep up with the changes occurring around us."

Boren said with the threat of Communism greatly reduced, U.S. influence in the 21st century will depend more on economic and social strength, two areas that have declined since the beginning of the Cold War.

"The simple truth is that we are not ready," he said. "It's time to shout to the American people to wake up."

According to Boren, in 1950, the United States had nine of the 10 largest banks in the world. By 1991, no American bank made the top 20.

Also, he said America's share of world trade and its per capita income have fallen drastically since the beginnings of the Cold War.

Boren also warned of a decline in social strength, pointing to the increase in crime as a leading indicator of erosion.

"Czechoslovakian President Václav Havel once said that he wanted to use America as a model for Czechoslovakia," Boren said. "Yet during a visit to Washington, this leader, known for his walks through Prague at all hours of the day and night, was told that it was not safe for him to walk at night in our nation's capital, even with his team of bodyguards."

Boren said U.S. cities are among the most unsafe in the world, 29 percent of all high school students drop out before the age of 18 and U.S. patents are on a steady decline, showing a lack of creativity and innovation.

Those who drop out of school are likely to end up in prison or have a drug problem, costing taxpayers $250,000 for each one who ends up on public assistance, he said.

"How can we be a great nation if Achieving balanced relationships with other nations is one of four steps in establishing a peace-keeping international economy.

two-thirds of our people have to carry the remaining third on their backs?" Boren said. "We've got to realize somehow that we are all a part of one American community."

Boren offered 12 ideas to improve the American economy and its social infrastructure, ranging from internationalizing education and unifying economic markets to expanding the Peace Corps and reforming Congress.

Boren concluded by urging Americans not to give up on themselves at this point in time and related a remark from a South African tribal leader.

"Those who mill around at a crossroads do so at their own peril," is what he said," Boren said. "We are at a crossroads. This is no time to mill around. It's not time to give up. Instead, it's time for each of us to do all we can to make America even greater."

"We have to say, 'We care enough about our country to make it happen.'"

Boren's speech was the 89th address delivered in the 25-year-old

Hill, Thomas will live in public trial forever

Senate hearings that began with the examination of the life story of Supreme Court nominee Clarence Thomas have turned into a tale of sex and politics. And neither Thomas nor his accuser, Anita Hill, will escape unscathed.

Even after days of testimony, the issue of whether Thomas engaged in sexual harassment may never be known.

But the inevitable damage to Thomas and Hill is easy to see.

Thomas and Hill are two intelligent and successful individuals caught up in a controversy that will ultimately damage both of them — personally and professionally.

These two apparently credible individuals have presented conflicting and convincing accounts. Experts say they both seem to be telling the truth.

A panel of Hill's friends and acquaintances corroborated parts of her testimony. A group of Thomas' former employees and colleagues vouched for his character.

Who is telling the truth? Hill and her friends? Thomas and his colleagues?

Unless Thomas unexpectedly withdraws, the Senate will have to make this decision at 6 tonight.

Regardless of the Senate decision, Thomas will have the entire episode lurking in the shadows of his career.

This incredible drama has grabbed the attention of the entire country. And Americans attentively wait for a Senate confirmation or rejection.

No matter what the outcome is, Americans will be left with a piece of the web blurring their vision of the actual truth. They have formed their opinions. And they will go on with their lives.

But Thomas and Hill will be caught in the web of these opinions for the rest of their lives.

Thanks Library donors show gift is in giving

Last week, anonymous donors gave $2 million to the Essential Edge Campaign — specifically, to Farrell Library.

It's great that someone finally has seen how desperately Farrell needs to be expanded. Other gifts are appreciated, but giving to the library is like giving to all students — not just the ones in a particular college or sport.

This gift points K-State in the right direction.

And K-Staters know how important good directions are when searching for books that Farrell didn't have the money to buy or the space to keep.

This gift will make conditions much better for everyone using the library. And the neatest thing is the donors gave without want. They did not want the publicity of such a large gift nor the open gratitude.

Thank you, whoever you are.

We are grateful.

Judging system gets jeers, not cheers

She didn't have the look.

Audra Henderson, freshman in elementary education, alleged last week that she was denied a position on the cheerleading squad because her body was not mature enough.

Cheerleader Adviser Scott Johnson pretty much said the same thing about Henderson. He said she didn't have the collegiate look. And Henderson said he went on to tell her, "If the judges would have gone by scores, four totally different girls would have been picked."

Johnson said the same thing — that points are only there to help the judges remember how the person did and "to use points if they feel points are necessary."

The K-State Cheerleaders have been a source of pride for Wildcat Country for several years and have performed well at national competitions many times.

But also in the past, many have argued the selection process has been a tainted one — "The whole thing is who knows who, and then over here you have favoritism."

Some have claimed good looks are much more important in the selection process than good performances. Some have said the whole thing should be judged by out-of-house judges rather than the traditional friends of friends of cheerleaders and the athletic department.

Obviously, something needs to be fixed. Judges should be out of house, if for no other reason than to get the selection process out of the hands of the cheerleading squad. And a point system should be set up and used, with appearance and performance categories offsetting and complementing each other.

So, if nothing else, the process will appear to be fair.

STEFFANY CARREL

Hill's allegations believable, columnist says

I got lost. I was 17, driving in St. Louis at midnight, and I got lost. To top it off, my car overheated.

On the verge of tears, I pulled over to the safety of the nearest well-lit Texaco.

The man there was nice. He calmed me down, bought me a Coke and told me my car would be fine in about 15 minutes.

So we talked. It was late, and there were few customers. He told me about his family — his sons, his wife. I thought, "What a nice man."

Fifteen minutes passed, and my car had sufficiently cooled. I was ready to go.

The man had other things in mind. He followed me outside of his service island. He lifted my shirt and touched my stomach.

"You're so thin," he said. "Look at you — you have to come home with me. I'll take care of you."

I was confused.

I mean, he'd helped me. He bought me a Coke, calmed me down and told me how to get where I wanted to go. Somehow, I couldn't quite see myself screaming, "Don't touch me!"

He was so calm. So smooth.

And what if he really was concerned about my nutritional intake?

I tried to push down the panic rising in my throat.

"I've really got to go now. You've been so nice, but my friends will worry. I'm so late as it is."

"No, you can't go, sweetheart. I insist that you come home with me. I really want you to."

"No really," I replied.

"Look — why don't you come over to my office? I'll get you some crackers," he said, pointing to a building behind the Texaco.

It was dark over there.

Then I saw those familiar symbols of man and woman.

That wasn't his office. Those were the damn restrooms.

That's when it clicked.

If he could get me over there, he'd hurt me. Maybe even rape me. I knew it.

Don't ask how. My self-preservation mode kicked in and I knew, no matter what, I could not let him get me over there.

I was calm — surprisingly so. I kept saying I had to go. He'd been so nice, but I really had to go.

A car had since come by to fill up, and its owner was ready to pay the man.

The second he went back inside I got in my car, locked the door and rolled up my window.

"Bye," I said and waved as I sped from the Texaco.

And then I cried, sick with fear and relief.

Until now, I've told four people about this. It's just not something you announce to someone upon introduction.

But beyond that fact, it has always been something I've felt embarrassed about. Thinking about it has always made me uncomfortable, as if it is a stain on my record. As if "good girls" don't have that sort of thing happen to them.

But that's all wrong. I didn't do anything to provoke the man. And I certainly didn't "owe him one" for helping me. At least not in that way.

To be sexually harassed is terribly demoralizing. It makes you feel powerless beyond imagination. It humiliates you. And it takes away a certain innocence — the innocence that lies in believing the world is a fair and safe place.

I recall my own experience now as America focuses on Clarence Thomas' alleged sexual harassment of Anita Hill. I can't say that I know in fact that she is right and he is wrong, but I have this gut instinct that she is not lying.

Setting her credible testimony and previously unblemished record aside, ask yourself why any intelligent, distinguished woman of her stature would make this up. It doesn't make sense.

It's frightening to hear the Senate Judiciary Committee try to label Anita Hill as a disturbed woman who had fantasies and delusions about Thomas. It's frightening to see them try to twist sexual harassment into "a woman scorned."

It sends a out a message. It says it's damn peachy that a man can threaten a woman as long as she isn't too badly bruised up. A man can dominate, control and otherwise terrorize a woman as long as she can still walk away.

But why should any woman have to deal with that?

More specifically, why should a woman have to and a man not?

Tell me what man goes through life with the constant fear of rape. It is certainly not to the same extent that it is with women.

Tell me what man goes through life worrying if his jeans are too tight. "Does he look like he wants it?"

Tell me what man goes to work concerned his female boss will strongly suggest he go out on a date with her or maybe he just won't get that promotion he so deserves.

Tell me what man goes through life knowing that even if he was most qualified, there would be no way in hell he'd ever be president.

You can't. You just can't.

It's because in this one society, men and women live in two different worlds with two entirely different sets of standards.

People have said Anita Hill was "lucky" she was only sexually harassed ... she wasn't raped or anything."

Many people have said the same thing to me.

"You were lucky, Steff, that he didn't hurt you ... that he didn't rape you."

Well, I wasn't lucky.

I wasn't lucky at all. I still suffered the abuse. I still felt the terror. I still carry the scar.

Services for deaf deserve attention

Editor,

I am writing in response to an article in the Sept. 24 Collegian titled "Interpreters needed; signing classes full."

From the headline it sounds like interpreters are taken from the sign class offered here, which, I hope doesn't happen. Professional interpreters spend two to three years in classes focusing on the language and culture of the deaf. One class is hardly comparable to such rigorous training.

The article also implies the director of services for students with physical limitations, Gretchen Holden, teaches a sign language class when, in fact, she doesn't even know enough sign to communicate with her deaf clients.

As an interpreter and one of the "native signers" to whom Gretchen referred, I would have to say the support services for the deaf offered here at K-State are minimal. There is a law requiring interpreters to be provided for deaf students, and I am appalled a state institution would put forth so little effort to comply.

Even when students are told they will have interpreters provided, they cannot be sure they will be able to understand the interpreters. As it stands, there is no evaluation process. People who think they have skills can walk into Holton Hall and put themselves on the interpreting roster — at least until a deaf student complains about their lack of skill.

Nor are all interpreters inherently right for any deaf student. There are different types of sign language, and in many cases, a deaf person raised in one language can no more easily understand an interpreter of another language than an American can understand Japanese.

I believe it is the job of the support services representative to evaluate and match interpreters with clients. That is very difficult to do when one does not understand the language or culture for which one is providing services.

I'm sure as deaf students and interpreters voice their opinions on the services available, the program will be modified. At least I certainly hope so for any future deaf students who try to gain an education at this university.

Although I love K-State, when I am asked by deaf friends about attending this university, I tell them to go elsewhere. It would be an embarrassment for me to suggest this school when I couldn't assure my friends they would be able to obtain the education here that they have a right to.

New & Improved Library ideas

Drastic times call for drastic measures

LISA EDMUNDS

When I was a money-grubbing yuppie out in the work force, my life was a lot more complicated. I had so many things to worry about — rush-hour traffic, property taxes, that whole Hope and Michael thing on "thirtysomething," and that pesky question of whether to serve white or red wine with brie.

Now that I'm in graduate school, my life is a lot simpler. I shop for the best bargains on generic macaroni and cheese. I go to school. I go home and study. I go to Farrell Library.

The library? You mean we've got a library on this campus?

Yes, Virginia, there is a Santa Claus, and, yes, Farrell is still standing. At least for now.

The current space and money crunches at Farrell affect everyone on campus, but as a graduate student in English, obviously, I spend a lot of time seeking out books.

Every time I seek out a scholarly journal or other publication we simply do not have the funds to carry any longer, I wind up cussing under my breath. And I am once again left to the mercy of Saint Interlibrary Loan — patron saint of all K-State graduate students.

A few weeks ago, something in me snapped.

On page 1 of the Collegian, there was a story about the planning of a student vote that could increase funding to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. On page 3, there was a small piece about budget problems and overcrowding at Farrell including a proposal to move some of the books to an alternate facility.

Is there a problem here? Am I the only one who finds that a little disturbing?

Am I the only one who has come to the conclusion that one can graduate from K-State without ever visiting the Rec Center, but chances are you won't graduate without visiting Farrell Library? (At least once to peruse an old copy of "Rolling Stone.")

Since it seems no one else on campus is giving much serious thought to saving Farrell, I sat down with pen and paper to compose a list of options.

This list of ideas is not exclusive, and I would suggest all other interested parties send their suggestions directly to folks like President Jon Wefald and Kansas legislators, who have control over funding some of these plans to save Farrell.

1) Have a bake sale. Or, better yet, get some kids together and put on a talent show. (Hey, it always worked in those Judy Garland/Mickey Rooney movies.)

2) Take out a really big insurance policy on Farrell and pray for a natural disaster.

3) Start charging money for information and question-answering services. Directions to Stack No. 6 or guidance on how to use the LYNX system alone might pay for a new addition.

4) Sell Farrell to the Japanese — they'll know how to turn a profit on it.

5) Set up a branch library at 100 Wilson Court. After a few days of students tramping through his home in search of 1950 issues of "American Teacher" and the Spanish translation of "Catcher in the Rye," I bet this whole library thing gets moved up on Wefald's priority list.

6) Pitch a tent in front of the K-State Union to sell cigarettes as a fund-raiser. Charge an extra buck for a warm, sheltered place to smoke. (This concession could finance a new football stadium in a matter of weeks, I'm sure.)

7) Turn it into a fraternity/sorority charity project. They'll make some T-shirts, drink a few beers and at least have a good time trying to save Farrell.

8) Start charging an extra user fee at the Rec Center that would go directly to Farrell. After watching my money go to support steroid-pumped athletes for years, it would be nice to see the Gatorade crowd support something I need from the University.

9) Buy a lot of really small books to help cut down on space problems.

10) Sell arms to the Sandanistas. I'm tired of the CIA reaping all the profits from these clandestine operations. Let's just make all these drug and arms sales deals public and let decent folks like ourselves bid on the projects — it's the American way.

Like I said, these are just some suggestions. The scary thing about it is that some of them are starting to make sense.

The administration's reaction to this pleased Kent Donovan, associate professor of history and faculty adviser for BaGaLs.

Hill returned to her home in Norman, Okla., where she reiterated her charge and chastised Republicans for attacking her character.

"I am not imagining the conduct to which I testified," she said. "The personal attacks on me without an iota of evidence were particularly offensive. I had nothing to gain by subjecting myself to the process. In fact, I had more to gain by remaining silent."

Hardnett, another former assistant to Thomas at the EEOC told Senate investigators that some black women who worked in his office felt they were "an object of sexual interest" and physical inspection by him.

Hardnett, who worked for Thomas from 1985 to 1986, did not allege sexual harassment but said, "If you were young, black, female and reasonably attractive, you knew full well you were being inspected and auditioned as a female."

Hardnett, who was interviewed by Republican and Democratic committee staff members after writing to the panel, was available to testify but was not called, largely because the panel was running out of time, said a Democratic committee aide who spoke on the condition of anonymity.

The panel also did not hear in person from another former employee with stronger allegations against Thomas, Angela Wright. Her private interview with the committee was released as part of the official record.

Cats finish strong, defeat Drake

Garrett breaks record for sets

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

K-State showed its good and bad sides Monday, but the Wildcats found the right formula at the end of its last non-conference volleyball match against Drake.

An efficient offense and strong defensive play helped K-State win a five-set match for a season sweep of the Bulldogs. The Cats improved to 9-12 with a 15-9, 15-4, 10-15, 6-15 and 15-8 victory.

K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer was pleased with the team's effort, as the Cats completed their second five-set win over the Bulldogs in two months.

"It was a good win," she said. "I think in the first two games, we played the best volleyball we've played all season, like we did at Kansas. For the first time, we did a real good job of balancing the line on defense."

The spikers started slow with five service errors. Alison Mott changed the momentum with a service ace for K-State's first lead at 5-4.

From that point, K-State dominated the game. Angie McKee and Rhonda Hughes led the team with four kills each as the Cats grabbed a 1-0 lead in the match.

The second set was all K-State. After a 2-2 tie, the Cats reeled off 10 straight points and breezed to a 15-4 win.

Then things changed.

"After winning the (second) game, the team got a little bit overconfident," Hagemeyer said. "There were some times I didn't know where the team was with their heads."

Drake battled back in the third game and won by scoring the final five points.

K-State was unable to recover in the fourth game and was forced by Drake to play the tie-breaker.

"My team went out on the court with the attitude to make a turnaround in the fifth game," Hagemeyer said. "They played a very good final set. We changed the lineup by putting Kathy Saxton only in the front line in order to score more points."

It worked. Saxton recorded 30

MIKE WELCH/HANS/Staff

Junior Kathy Saxton prepares to launch a serve during Monday's non-conference match against Drake at Ahearn Field House. Saxton recorded a team-high 30 kills as the Wildcats improved their season record to 9-12 with a five-set win, 15-9, 15-4, 10-15, 6-15 and 15-8.

kills and a .531 hitting percentage. McKee added 20 kills and a .410 hitting percentage.

"Angie and Kathy came off an excellent weekend," Hagemeyer said. "Right now, I think they play the best volleyball I've seen those two play. They have to play like that to make us successful."

Hughes and McKee combined for 41 digs to lead the defense. But the highlight was a new record for assists in a five-game match by Wendy Garrett. Garrett's 70 assists broke a 6-year-old record of 65 assists by Renee Whitney.

"I think it is pretty exciting for Wendy, who has only been setting for one year," Hagemeyer said. "She made outstanding progress this season to come out here and break the assists record."

Braves chop up chances

By the Associated Press

ATLANTA — The Pittsburgh Pirates gave the Atlanta Braves every chance to win.

The Braves blew a bases-loaded threat early on a blown squeeze, missed another opportunity when David Justice missed third base and then stranded Terry Pendleton at third in the eighth inning.

In the ninth, they had a runner on third but reliever Roger Mason retired Mark Lemke and Jeff Blauser.

Zane Smith outpitched Tom Glavine, and the Pirates hung on to beat the Braves 1-0 Monday for a 3-2 lead in the NL playoffs.

Jose Lind singled home the only run in the fifth inning.

Smith and reliever Roger Mason combined to scatter eight hits and extend Atlanta's scoreless streak to 18 innings. Mason took over after Pendleton's two-out triple in the eighth, got Ron Gant on a pop-up and finished for a save.

In the ninth, pinch hitter Tommy Gregg and Greg Olson singled with one out. Lemke's grounder moved Gregg to third and Blauser flied out for the final out.

Justice was on second base with two outs in the fourth inning when Lemke singled. Justice tripped as he neared third base and stepped over the bag.

Justice kept going and scored ahead of catcher Don Slaught's tag. Nearly all of the Pirates had seen Justice miss the base, and third baseman Steve Buechele was jumping up and down to call attention to the mistake.

While Justice stood halfway to the dugout, Smith calmly took the ball from Slaught and threw to third, where umpire Frank Pulli was waiting to make the call. There was no argument from Justice.

Trainers' opportunities unique

By the Collegian Staff

Behind every K-State team, there is another team of students working to learn about sports medicine and athletic injuries: the student athletic trainers.

Head Trainer Todd Toriscelli was formerly an assistant trainer at Purdue and head trainer at an NCAA Division III school.

Toriscelli said the first year is an observational period for student athletic trainers.

"During this time, students take classes, observe and rotate through different sports, so that eventually they will see all the sports."

"Next, we select the top students. After that, they begin getting assignments and actually begin to get hands-on experience."

Mark Kennedy, senior in physical education, is one of those fortunate enough to get that "hands-on experience." He has worked as a student trainer for the football team for more than a year.

Kennedy said he generally works about 5½ hours a day, including weekends, and about 3½ hours before every home game.

The busiest period for student trainers is before a football game, Kennedy said.

"Before the game, we get coolers ready for the referees, players and coaches," he said.

"We also start taping ankles, wrists and braces if players have them. Generally, taping ankles takes the most time."

Kennedy said student trainers are also responsible for setting up equipment on the sidelines. During this time, splints and supply kits are prepared to assist the trainers.

"We as student trainers are allowed to watch and assist if needed," he said. "If the trainers need something, then we get it for them."

Before students can become certified, Toriscelli said, they must pass a written and oral exam given by the National Training Association.

K-State is the only school in Kansas with a student athletic training program, he said.

Jonna Stigall, senior in exercise science, transferred from a school in Texas specifically because of K-State's approved training program.

The fact that Stigall is female hasn't hindered her hopes of being a trainer.

"But I can't exactly march through the locker room any time I want," she said.

Runners compete for titles

4 win races in intramural meet

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

A large percentage of people think their days of athletic competition end with their high school graduation.

Yet many of them remain athletes at heart. That is especially true for cross-country runners.

Sunday proved to be a great opportunity for that group, as 191 K-State students gathered at Manhattan's Warner Park, the site of the intramural cross-country meet.

The event also gave athletes a chance to represent their living groups.

The fraternity division was won by Tom Swanson of Beta Theta Pi, who covered the two-mile course in 10:25. Swanson said that the race was enjoyable for him because, unlike in high school, he could participate in a relaxed atmosphere.

"I ran in high school where I would run to win," Swanson said. "I liked this because it was non-stressing."

Swanson was no stranger to the site, which also plays host to the high school state championships in Kansas. Swanson was a two-time state champion in high school.

"I ran to help the team and to stay in shape," Swanson said.

Swanson's nearest finishers were Kevin Sampson of Theta Xi (10:38), Steve Palmer of Sigma Nu (10:48), Bryan Reiger of Sigma Chi (11:12) and Darren Klish of Beta Theta Pi (11:18).

The Betas won the fraternity title. Second was Sigma Chi, followed by Theta Xi, Sigma Nu and Alpha Kappa Lambda.

On the women's side, Jodi Gaskill of Alpha Delta Pi edged out Gamma Phi Beta's Sally Brace. Gaskill finished in a time of 14:33.17 to Brace's time of 14:33.65.

For Brace, the race was a new experience.

"I enjoy running. I run about 45 minutes a day," Brace said. "But I have never ran for competition, like in cross country. I was surprised that I did that well."

On the strength of Brace's finish and her sorority sister, Jocelyn Viterma, who finished third in 14:35.42, the Gamma Phis took the women's title. Kappa Kappa Gamma finished second and Alpha Delta Pi placed third.

Other individual finishers were Amy Tumquist of Kappa Kappa Gamma (14:51) and Shelly Kimble of Delta Delta Delta (15:00).

In the residence hall division, Marlett 5 was victorious, led by Bruce Zook's second-place finish. Zook completed the course in 12:03. The individual champion was Damian Almonza of Edwards Hall.

Players, coaches believed in selves

Media blitz may have fueled team's inspiration in KU win

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

"Free at last! Free at last! Thank God Almighty, we are free at last!" — Martin Luther King Jr.

Although these words have a much greater meaning, they could be applied to the feelings of the K-State football players.

ANALYSIS

After coming from behind to beat KU 16-12, the players on this team have gotten the proverbial monkey off their backs.

But there are two more stories that were never written about things that affected the game's outcome.

Something noticeable when talking to the players and a few of the coaches after the game was the feeling they knew they have arrived as a contending team — even before the season started. It's just that the Jayhawks have had the Wildcats' number for the last few years.

"We never gave up," K-State quarterback Paul Watson said. "We had faith and went down and put two scores on the board."

Maybe we in the media remember too much at times.

We remember how fans would leave early in the second half of some games. We also saw the avalanche that would bury the Cats after an opponent scored a touchdown.

So, with the Jayhawks up 12-3 with 8:09 remaining, depression and the thought of staying home to watch baseball that night entered this writer's mind.

Well, Coach Bill Snyder let us in the media know those days are over and have been for some time. He had every right to do so. We're just glad he doesn't have the temperament of Indiana basketball coach Bobby Knight.

So, in some ways, the media may have helped bring about the win.

In almost every story printed last week, references abounded to KU winning the game outright and K-State possibly hanging on for a close game.

That didn't set too well with Snyder.

He probably took those clippings and showed how much faith we had in his team — little to none.

Coach, thanks for proving the media wrong.

The other story behind the story is about the fan. All 40,856 of you screaming fanatics helped bring the Governor's Cup back to Manhattan for the first time since 1986.

In several post-game interviews, the players mentioned the fans.

I've been around this school for quite some time now. I admit that I have grown accustomed to seeing the fans pack up and leave to get a good parking spot in Aggieville.

But the majority of you stayed, and the team wishes to thank you.

"They yelled so much and so loud for so long," defensive tackle Anthony Williams said. "I know this is a cliché, but they were our 12th man out there today. I just wish it was like this every game. We need these people to act like this at every home game — even an away game, if they can make it."

"Heck, Nebraska's not that far away. Just want each and every fan to know that we love them all to death."

With the win, the Cats moved to 4-1, the best mark they've had since 1969. Go ahead and let the buzz grow to words of belief. The Cats think they'll finish with a winning record for the first time since 1982. Incidentally, that was the first and only year they went to a bowl game — the Independence Bowl.

When cornerback Rogerick Green saw President Jon Wefald bring the Cup to the post-game press conference, he said, "I never knew what it looked like. But the fans deserve a piece of it, too."

But kudos go to Snyder and his coaching staff.

If they had believed the press clippings, their attitudes would have been like those of the fans of old.

Watson, Barta make it a sweep

From Staff and Wire Reports

Senior quarterback Paul Watson and junior linebacker Brooks Barta made it a clean sweep for K-State in the Big Eight player-of-the-week sweepstakes.

Watson, from Kansas City, Mo., was selected for offensive honors Monday after leading the Wildcats on fourth-quarter scoring drives of 94 and 66 yards in a 16-12 victory over KU.

He completed 18 of 36 passes for 209 yards and a touchdown and converted all four third-down attempts. After being pulled in favor of Jason Smargiasso, Watson came back and connected on 10 of 15 passes for 145 yards on the two late scoring drives.

Barta, a Smith Center native, recorded a team-leading 17 tackles, broke up a pass and contributed a sack. Three of his tackles came on Jayhawk fourth-down attempts deep in K-State territory.

Barta won in a split vote over Oklahoma linebacker Joe Bowden, who was credited with 18 tackles in the Sooners' 10-7 loss to Texas.

This marks the third time Barta has won the award.

"Brooks was out of character a little," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "He truly became visible."

Search for happiness leads to action, comedy

'Waiting for the Light' lifts the heart, skips believability

JENNIFER BEALS
A&E Writer

It often takes unfortunate circumstances for many people to see the light.

Edward Pressman's production of "Waiting for the Light" teams Shirley MacLaine and Teri Garr in their quest for enlightenment.

This low-budget flick, recently released on video, casts MacLaine in her typical flamboyant style. Garr, on the other hand, is put on the back burner with an unusually unsuggestive role.

Set amidst the construction of bomb shelters and the Cuban missile crisis, Kay (Garr), a single, working mother and her aunt, Zena (MacLaine), attempt to keep their small family together.

Kay has two juvenile delinquent children who can't seem to stay in school for a whole day. At the same time, Zena, a sadistic birthday party magician, is practically sued for attempting to dismember her assistant. After this stunt, Kay and her family move to the Pacific Northwest.

Seasoned with hilarious comedy and satire, this film is sure to grab the audience on its joy ride.

VIDEO REVIEW

Waiting for the Light
Teri Garr, Shirley MacLaine

"Waiting for the Light" provides the audience with a combination of comedy, romance and action. By lifting the heart of the viewer, this film creates a theme of having and keeping the faith.

MacLaine is amusing as she rigs up some of the most elaborate gags. From the headline titles of her favorite dirt rag, The Informer, to her unforgettable lines, she almost resembles her character from "Steel Magnolias."

The film picks up after Zena and the children play a trick on an unsuspecting neighbor. This group starts more repercussions than it bargains for — with only revenge in mind.

One element of the plot that keeps this film interesting is the character development.

From the beginning to the last few minutes, it is evident the characters have changed. Most transformations are quite sudden, but a few characters develop through the progression of the film.

Another attractive feature of the film is the setting, which is the 1960s. The director takes careful planning to provide a genuine backdrop.

Credit should also be given to the costume designer for preparing true-to-life clothing that captures the feel of the era.

One of the few disliked elements of the movie is the speed of the plot. In some instances, the film whisks along, but at other times, the film is so slow it's lifeless.

Another annoying feature in this film is the fact that everything comes together neatly. This tends to put the film in a negative light on believability.

"Waiting For the Light" provides the audience with a combination of comedy, romance and action. By lifting the heart of the viewer, this film creates a theme of having and keeping the faith.

Musical journey takes listener around the world

Rippingtons' new album ventures into the jungle, moonlight

ERIC BRUNT

Contributing A&E Writer

Editor's Note: Eric Brunt is the president of New Currents, K-State's Jazz/New Age/Fusion music appreciation club.

The Rippingtons' latest release,

GUEST REVIEWER

"Curves Ahead," takes the band's audience on a multicultural journey lasting 48 mood-evoking minutes.

This musical journey has all the intricacies of quality music without becoming overbearing to the listener. Each track features different solo artists, thereby showing the quality of the group.

"Santa Fe Trail," the third track on the album, has a definite Latin influence. The lead instruments are brass backed up by a Latin dance rhythm.

The Rippingtons show their musical diversity by backing up "Santa Fe Trail" with "Take Me With You." This slower song brings romance back into the limelight. The listener easily pictures moonlight on a calm lake or a candlelight dinner for two.

The ability to evoke such strong emotions without effort is hard to come by. On "Nature Of The Beast," the Rippingtons take the listener to the jungle. The Latin influence is partially replaced by African tendencies. The usage of bird calls, rain sticks, seed pods and various African instruments adds to the highly personalized sound of the jungle.

The original group was composed of Russ Freeman, Kenny G and David Benoit. The result was the first Rippingtons album "Moonlighting." Kenny G and Benoit both continued on to ensure their place in the jazz world.

Freeman soon followed with albums such as "Kilimanjaro," "Tourist in Paradise," "Welcome to the St. James' Club" and his most recent recording, "Curves Ahead." The Rippingtons are now composed of various multitalented artists, headed by Russ Freeman who composes, arranges and produces.

In a recent article in Jazziz magazine, Freeman gave this description of his music: "The Rippingtons' records sound like pop records, but there's no singer. Instead, there's a guitar or sax or synthesizer playing the melody."

Take time away from the headaches of class and allow the Rippingtons to take you on their musical journey. †

ALCOHOL: IS IT A GAMBLE?

OCTOBER 13-19, 1991

127 Kansans were killed in 1990 in alcohol-related accidents.

Last year in Kansas, 44 young adult drivers (ages 18-25) were killed in alcohol-related accidents.

Approximately 100 KSU students are arrested every school year in Riley county for DUI.

Alcohol-related accidents are one of the leading causes of death for KSU students.

60% of college women are intoxicated when infected with STD.

64% of KSU students admit to drinking and driving.

94% of KSU students consume alcohol 1.5 times per week.

2nd novel not up to 'Postcards'

Carrie Fisher enters soap opera world; characters too simple

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

Carrie Fisher's second novel, "Surrender the Pink," which was just released in paperback, is a real disappointment. It is dull, uninspired and unoriginal.

Fisher's first novel, "Postcards From the Edge," was a real delight — witty, provocative, insightful and a real surprise.

I would've never guessed that this child of Hollywood — she's daughter of Eddie Fisher and Debbie Reynolds, known mostly for her marriage to Paul Simon and sporadic acting career — would pen such a wonderful novel.

I read "Postcards" more than once. I loved it. I bought copies for my friends.

I looked forward to her next novel with anticipation. I thought Fisher would come up with a winner the second time around. Never did I figure her for what they call a "one-trick pony," in the music business — a one-hit wonder.

I like to think of it as "Princess Whine Strikes Back."

The real beauty of "Postcards From the Edge," I guess, was that Fisher was writing about things she knew — Hollywood, drugs, losing your grip on reality. In "Surrender the Pink," she moves away from the world she knows best, and the characters suffer for it.

Dinah Kaufman, the protagonist of "Surrender," is a soap opera writer with some major, major problems. She is, like many of us, floundering a little. These are tough times for lovers indeed, but then there are folks like Dinah who seem to thrive off the floundering, afraid to succeed.

She loses the great love of her life, a successful playwright named Rudy, because she keeps sabotaging the relationship. Dinah figures it is better to leave than be left and winds up only wanting men who leave.

"Since she would probably never feel loved anyway, it was a lot easier to feel that that was a result of someone's behavior toward her, rather than some deficit in herself," our whiny, whippy heroine tells herself.

Given a more fully drawn character, or maybe cast of characters, the reader might find some sympathy for

M. Butterfly

TONIGHT 8 p.m.

A story so bizarre it could only be true.

For 20 years a French diplomat had an affair with a Beijing opera star, who presented him with a child as a memento. But the diplomat's butterfly turned out to be quite different from the Cio Cio San of Puccini's Madama Butterfly. In this fascinating tale, David Henry Hwang takes a look at how the East and West misperceive each other and how the relations between the sexes have changed. Winner of the 1988 Tony Award for Best Play.

"Bold, intensely dramatic, thought-provoking, and stunningly presented, M. Butterfly is a play I promise you will never forget." (Newhouse Newspapers)

French students study agriculture

New education system challenges graduate interns

AMY FUNK
Collegian Reporter

For most students, 40 hours of classes a week may seem like too much work. But for Laetitia Delvolve and Pascale Lhermite, it is a normal class load.

Delvolve and Lhermite are French students who study at the graduate school of agriculture in Toulouse, France. They are spending part of their fifth year of study in a six-month internship at K-State. The internship is an in-depth development of marketing projects of interest to Kansas.

Lhermite arrived in Manhattan in January with three other French exchange students and took classes at K-State for a semester as part of her fourth year of study.

She decided to stay at K-State for her required fifth year internship to learn more about the agriculture programs and the educational system here.

"In France, we spend 30 to 40 hours a week in class," Lhermite said. "Here, you don't have classes too long, and it is like a summary of what you are supposed to read."

"In our school, you attend the class, and much of what you have to know is taught during the class. It's a different way of teaching."

The internship is a new experience for Delvolve who has never been to the United States before. She said a big change is the way the University is organized.

"K-State is completely different than the university I attend in France," Delvolve said. "Here, you live more like a community, and all the departments are combined into one school."

"In Toulouse, there are 70,000 students. But you can't see it, because they are divided among the individual universities."

Delvolve said the universities in France are smaller. Each specializes in a certain subject, such as science, social science, literature and agriculture.

"In France, there are many different universities in each town," she said. "Most students stay in their hometowns to go to school, because there are universities in nearly every medium or large town."

Delvolve said another difference is the relationship among students and instructors.

MIKE VENSO/Staff

Pascale Lhermite and Laetitia Delvolve are on a six-month, agricultural-economics internship at K-State. Both are fourth-year students at the E.S.A. Purpan Graduate School of Agriculture in Toulouse, France. They like American life but prefer French apartments to the residence halls.

"When you go to classes here, you get phone numbers of the professors and can go and visit with them any time," she said. "In France, it is difficult because there are up to 800 students in one class."

"Only the most motivated students can develop a good relationship with the instructor in France," Delvolve said.

But university life is only one difference between the two countries.

Although Aggieville is a popular place for many K-State students, Delvolve and Lhermite said they are not impressed.

"Aggieville is too crowded, too noisy and the music is terrible," Delvolve said. "In France, we go to a cafe to meet friends and laugh and talk, but it is quiet."

Lhermite said another unusual sight is the number of cars in Aggieville.

"In France, nobody cruises the streets," she said. "I don't understand why people do that."

"I would get tired of driving around in circles after awhile."

Lhermite said the structure of Manhattan is very different from Toulouse.

"The history of most cities in France is much older than that of cities."

"For example, the structure of the streets and buildings in Manhattan is very different than those in Toulouse."

"In France, most buildings have four stories or less, even in the cities."

Even though many aspects of life in Manhattan differ from those in France, both women said they are enjoying the challenge of experiencing a new culture.

Burmese dissident wins Nobel

By the Associated Press

OSLO, Norway — Burmese opposition leader Aung San Suu Kyi, who has been under house arrest for two years for her struggle to achieve democracy in her homeland, was awarded the 1991 Nobel Peace Prize on Monday.

The Nobel Committee acknowledged that Suu Kyi may not know of her $1 million award. Burma's military junta bars her from receiving visitors or communicating with outsiders.

"It is clear that there will be difficulty" in getting the news through, said Norwegian Nobel Committee Chairman Francis Sejersted.

Suu Kyi, 46, the daughter of Burmese independence hero Aung San, won for insisting on non-violent means to bring democracy to her impoverished Southeast Asian homeland of 40 million people.

Her party, the National League for Democracy, overwhelmingly won parliamentary elections in May 1990, but Burma's generals have refused to end their repressive rule and let the opposition party take power.

ALCOHOL AND THE BODY

- 1. MOUTH AND ESOPHAGUS
Alcohol irritates the delicate linings of the throat and esophagus; that's why it causes a burning sensation as it goes down.
- 2. STOMACH AND INTESTINES
Alcohol also irritates the stomach's protective lining, which can lead to gastric or duodenal ulcers. In the small intestine, alcohol blocks absorption of substances such as thiamine, folic acid, zylase, fat, vitamin B1, vitamin B12, and amino acids.
- 3. BLOODSTREAM
Ninety percent of the alcohol taken into the body is absorbed into the bloodstream through the lining of the stomach and duodenum. Alcohol causes a slowing of the circulation systems and deprives tissues of oxygen. Alcohol also slows the ability of white blood cells to engulf and destroy bacteria and the clotting ability of blood platelets.
- 4. PANCREAS
Alcohol irritates the cells of the pancreas and can lead to acute hemorrhagic pancreatitis. Pancreatitis can destroy the pancreas and create a lack of insulin.
- 5. LIVER
Alcohol inflames and destroys the cells of the liver. This condition prevents bile from being properly filtered through the liver. Jaundice develops, turning the whites of the eyes and the skin yellow.
- 6. HEART
Alcohol causes inflammation of the heart muscle.
- 7. URINARY BLADDER AND KIDNEYS
Alcohol inflames the lining of the urinary bladder. In the kidneys, alcohol causes an increased loss of fluids, through its irritating effect.
- 8. SEX GLANDS
Swelling of the prostate gland caused by alcohol interferes with the ability of the male to perform sexually. It also interferes with the ability of the male and female to climax during intercourse.
- 9. BRAIN
The most dramatic and noticed effect of alcohol is on the brain. It produces lack of coordination, confusion, disorientation, stupor, anesthesia, coma, and finally death.

'I think this is a real tragedy,' senator says

PAT OBLEY
City/Government Editor

Despite allegations against him, Clarence Thomas probably will receive Senate confirmation, said Sen. David Boren, D-Okla., following his Landon Lecture Monday.

Boren based his prediction on the lack of overwhelming evidence provided by University of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill's colleagues of sexual harassment on Thomas' behalf.

He said if the American people took the position that if anyone has an allegation made against them and they are subsequently disqualified from service, the results could be disastrous.

"We will be creating a climate which will encourage people from now on to accuse anybody in public office of anything they want," Boren said. "This is America. We do fundamentally believe that a person is innocent until proven guilty whoever that man or woman turns out to be."

Boren said it is important for people to distinguish between allegations and truth.

"The mere surfacing of an allegation alone is different if the allegation is substantiated," Boren said. "If we find at the end of this process it is proven that he did the things that were alleged, that's different."

"If we go on the basis that he has been alleged to have done anything, with sexual harassment or anything else, until it's proven, I don't think that the mere allegation should disqualify him.

"I think it would be a terrible precedent in this country if we disqualified everybody from a position of trust because they've been accused of something that's personally painful to them."

Though he has not publicly commented on how he will vote Tuesday, Boren has in the past supported Thomas as one of 14 swing voters from the Democratic Party. Boren said the recent revelations have not dramatically affected any senators' decisions since no solid evidence has been brought forward from the Hill camp.

"Certainly, 48 hours before the last scheduled vote most people would have said Judge Thomas was going to be confirmed with probably 60 votes," Boren said. "I think that unless something new comes forward in the way of evidence or additional collaboration, that he will probably be confirmed."

Lastly, Boren said he felt the process hurt the reputation of the Senate and the pride of those involved.

"Two very credible people have been forced to attack one another vehemently," Boren said. "One thing I think is very clear is that the confirmation process itself is flawed. I think that is because people have gotten so frightened of taking a stand when they are going through hearings."

"The committee acted irresponsibly as staff members for leaking this information to the public," Boren said. "Since the Bork nomination, both sides, the right and the left, have started approaching the Supreme Court confirmations with political campaigns in mind."

"I think this is a real tragedy."

changing color and with cooler weather there would be more color, he said.

"If we continue to have temperatures that are cool, and we don't have high winds or a hard freeze then we will have good color on the trees," Nighswonger said.

He said the process includes the amount of daylight the tree receives, the decline in the green chlorophyll letting other colors that were masked come out and the temperature the moisture that the tree receives.

"It's just like making wine," Wong said. "Some years are better than others."

This year has been especially hard on the trees, Wong said, because of the drought and the 20-degree temperatures that occurred a couple of weekends ago. Temperatures in the 20s are hard for the trees to stand, enabling them to develop their bright pigments.

We haven't had perfect fall pigment-producing days, but Wong said Kansas doesn't have many days like that.

As far as tree care, Joel Brinker, president of Brinker Tree Care, said the main thing a person can do is to water their trees. He also said many people water just the top of their lawn with a sprinkler system, which isn't effective when it comes to tree care. When watering the tree, the water must be deep in the soil to help the tree.

Brinker said this year's dry conditions have caused many trees' leaf retention to be very short. He also said many trees may be dropping their leaves early.

"You can never say for sure what the fall will be like," Brinker said, because the conditions change so much around the area."

Many towns — mostly in north-eastern Kansas — have foliage tours, he said. Some communities like Baldwin and Hawthorne even have a maple festival.

Alan Ladd of the county extension office said the ground's moisture was good until early June, then the heat came without very much rain making the ground moisture very low. Fertilization will also help the tree.

K-State is celebrating the 25th anniversary of the Alfred M. Landon Lecture Series on Public Issues with an exhibit in the McCain Auditorium galleries through October.

The exhibit features photographs of the 88 past lecturers.

Every lecturer is included, from former Kansas Gov. Alf Landon, who inaugurated the series in 1966, to former President Jimmy Carter, who spoke last April.

"The lecture series is one of the most prestigious series in the nation," said Charles Reagan, lecture series chairman and assistant to President Jon Wefald.

Reagan said there are about 500 patrons who sponsor the lecture series.

"Patron contributions fund the lecture series," he said. "No University funds are used."

The lecture series is a tribute to Landon, who was a distinguished leader in Kansas politics for many years. He was the Republican presidential nominee in 1936.

The three key figures involved in the development of the lecture series were Landon, then President James McCain and William Boyer, the first chairperson of the lecture series and Boyer, who is the only of the three still alive, is currently a professor of public administration at the University of Delaware.

He said the lecture series idea was originally his.

"After hearing of a similar lecture series at the University of Chicago," Boyer said, "I thought it would be a good thing to do at K-State."

Both McCain and Landon agreed on the idea, and Boyer was asked to take charge of the series, while McCain and Landon began selecting speakers.

On Dec. 13, 1966, Landon delivered the first lecture in the series, "New Challenges in International Relations."

Dinah chases after Rudy once he has settled into domestic bliss with another woman — only then does he

There are a number of funny and touching scenes but not enough to carry the reader through the sniveling mess of a novel "Surrender the Pink" becomes.

Never does Dinah find the inner resources to overcome her fears or learn from her mistakes, so one must wonder just what the purpose of this novel really is.

Forget "Surrender the Pink," and go read "Postcards From the Edge" one more time. My only hope is that Fisher does too, and maybe she can find the inspiration to return to the level of writing she showed in her first effort.

He said there is a need to emphasize development to aid in balancing relationships and minimizing ecological stresses to keep peace, because these factors could lead to greater prosperity.

"A peace-keeping economic structure is the key," Dumas said. "We need to abandon bankrupt ideas and change our ways of thinking."

Dumas said cooperation has allowed the nation to survive, but the need to fight hasn't.

Thomas is new justice

Senate confirms Supreme Court nominee on a 52-48 vote

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Clarence Thomas won Senate confirmation for the Supreme Court Tuesday night on a 52-48 vote, overcoming explosive accusations of sexual harassment to become the second black justice in history.

With crucial help from Southern Democrats, Thomas will take his seat as the 106th justice, a staunchly conservative successor to one of the court's last liberals.

The vote ended one of the angriest, most emotionally charged confirmation battles ever.

Thomas said he wanted to put the ordeal behind him.

"This is more a time for healing, not a time for anger or for animus or animosity," Thomas said, standing outside his house with his wife, Virginia, under an umbrella in the rain.

"I guess in so many ways, as I say to my wife so many times, I'd like to thank America," said Thomas, who rose from rural poverty in Georgia to prominence in government.

Thomas had been accused by University of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill of making unwanted advances and humiliating her with lewd remarks a decade ago when she worked for him at the Education Department and Equal Employment Opportunity Commission. Her surprise charges brought an abrupt halt to the Senate's plans to vote on Thomas' nomination a week ago.

Thomas emphatically denied the charges and complained he was the victim of a "high-tech lynching." The nation was transfixed as the accusations were spelled out in explicit detail and debated in nationally televised hearings.

In Oklahoma, Hill said she was satisfied she had been "able to go out and tell what I knew to be true." She also said she was pleased that national awareness of sexual harassment had been raised.

"What I hope is that none of this will deter others from coming forward. This is an important issue and the dialogue will not stop here," she said.

Immediately after the vote, President Bush called Thomas with congratulations. Thomas had watched the vote on television at home.

"You're a wonderful inspiration, and you had the overwhelming support of the American people," Bush said, according to press secretary

K-State student supports, praises former employer

A K-State student recently traveled to Washington, D.C., to support her former employer, Clarence Thomas.

Adrienne Carter, graduate in student counseling and personal services, worked for Thomas at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission from June 1987 to October 1989.

"I cannot speak for Ms. Hill's motivation or to the validity of her story," Carter said. "However, I can say that the Clarence Thomas I know is a kind, conscientious, professional, intelligent black man."

"I have never seen him approach or speak to any female in a less than gentleman-like manner — never, ever," she said. "He was very supportive of his staff, and he always emphasized professionalism in the workplace."

She described the atmosphere in Washington as chilly. She said many people were surprised to see Thomas confronted with such allegations.

"I can say that many of my former co-workers who spoke on his behalf before the Senate committee gave an adequate and accurate description of Clarence Thomas," Carter said.

She added that his demeanor during the last days of the confirmation hearings showed he is human, has feelings and gets angry like everyone else.

She said Thomas was a positive person with laughter that was jolly "like Santa Claus."

"He always looked like there weren't any worries in his life," she said. "The first time I have ever seen

Faculty Senate discusses programs, fees

Budget cut rumors worry professors

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

It is hard to be a good teacher when you are worried about your job.

That was the sentiment expressed by a member of the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee during a meeting Tuesday afternoon.

Kenneth Brooks, faculty committee member, said the issue of potential growth and consolidation within K-State colleges places a cloud over academic environments.

"The climate suggests that our administration is talking about cutting programs," he said. "That's part of the negative environment."

One committee member said there was a rumor going around that the colleges of Agriculture, Engineering and Business Administration were slated for growth, but the colleges of Human Ecology, Education and Architecture and Design were slated for consolidation.

The College of Arts and Sciences was not mentioned.

Linda Thurston, chairwoman of the committee, said any time there are financial constraints on an agency, there are rumors about what will have to happen to deal with the constraints.

"There are rumors at K-State about the budget crunch," she said. "I've not heard that someone has made up their mind as to what will be done."

President Jon Wefald agreed there are problems caused by cuts

High number of drop/adds may cost students money

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The possibility of charging students money for dropping classes was discussed in the Faculty Senate Academic Affairs Committee meeting Tuesday afternoon.

The fee would be an attempt to control the overwhelming number of drop/adds with which K-State has to deal and the increasing associated costs.

Jerry Weis, faculty committee member, said he thinks the reasoning behind the fee is that if students know they are going to pay for something, they might think more about it.

"If they know dropping courses will cost money, they might be more careful at initial enrollment," he said. "I guess there is some validity to that point, but I'm still not convinced money is the answer."

Weis said there were 1,100 drops on the last day to drop classes without a W showing up on student transcripts.

"Faculty members say students can take a class forever before they drop it," he said.

Delayed drops raise concerns among faculty members because the vacated space can no longer be filled, and in a sense, is wasted.

Linda Thurston, committee chairwoman, said many faculty

Bomb threat hoax not a joke

$250,000 fine, five years in jail maximum penalty

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

Bomb threats on campus often increase during test time.

Even though it may be convenient to call in a threat for the building where a test is to be taken, Special Agent Max Geiman of the FBI said it could have drastic consequences.

"The maximum penalty for a bomb threat is five years in jail, up to a $250,000 fine or both," he said.

K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom said campus police are close to identifying one of the persons who phoned in a bomb threat earlier this semester. He said he would push for a harsh penalty if the person is caught.

"What some people consider a joke, we do not," Beckom said. "That person should not just be slapped on the hands for the threat."

"The penalty is quite severe, and I don't think people realize the severity of it."

Geiman said in addition to the penalty of a bomb threat, other charges can sometimes be added.

There have been people killed in traffic accidents caused with emergency vehicles en route to the scene, he said, and others have been trampled during panic caused by the threat.

John Lambert, director of public safety, said the University has procedures for handling bomb threats, but they need to be updated.

"We need to rewrite the policy to where it will be more in tone with the times," he said.

Lambert said he will present a revision of the procedures to the traffic council, which is part of the public safety department, at 3 p.m. Thursday in the Union Stateroom 1.

Tuitions victims of cuts in budgets

By the Associated Press

NEW YORK — Fall tuitions at public colleges and universities climbed by double digits for the first time in eight years as higher education fell victim to state budget cuts, the College Board reported Tuesday.

Average in-state tuitions and fees at four-year public universities rose by 12 percent to $2,137, from $1,908 in 1990-91. Room and board charges increased by 6 percent to $3,351, bringing total average fixed charges at public institutions to $5,488.

This fall's increase marked the first double-digit jump in such rates since 1983-84, when the average also went up by 12 percent.

Tuitions and fees were up an even sharper 13 percent at two-year public universities, by far the fastest growing sector of higher education with some 4.7 million full-time students. Fall tuitions there averaged $1,022, compared with $906 a year ago.

College Board President Donald Stewart said the big jump in tuitions

Cats to get Governor's Cup ... again

TOPEKA (AP) — Co-captains of the K-State football team will visit Gov. Joan Finney's office Wednesday to officially receive the governor's cup for defeating KU, 16-12, last Saturday.

Finney, who was returning from a trip to Europe and missed the game, is scheduled to present the trophy to co-captains Paul Watson, Michael Smith, Brooks Barta, Russ Campbell and Elijah Alexander at a 10:45 a.m. ceremony.

They will be accompanied to Topeka by K-State Athletic Director

Milt Richards; Ben Boyle, sports information director, and Sue Peterson, assistant to K-State President Jon Wefald. Coach Bill Snyder is not scheduled to attend, the governor's press office said.

The cup first was presented when the late Robert B. Docking was governor in the early 1970s. Governors traditionally have gone to the winning team's dressing room to present the trophy following the game. Wefald presented it to the Wildcats in the dressing room Saturday.

State Fair attendance up 3.1 percent

HUTCHINSON (AP) — Attendance at the 1991 Kansas State Fair reached more than 332,000, which is 3.1 percent more than the year before, fair general manager Bob Gottschalk said.

"Considering the heavy rains on the first Saturday and the threat of rain on the second Saturday, we are very pleased to have managed a three percent increase," Gottschalk said Monday. Attendance totaled 332,059 in 1991, compared to 322,027 in 1990.

This year's figures made the fair the third largest since 1975, Gottschalk said. Prior to 1975, less accurate guesses were made.

The two fairs that exceeded this year's event were in 1984, when 343,241 attended and in 1987, when 333,675 attended.

Construction halted on, er, ... treehouse

LOS ANGELES (AP) — A backyard treehouse, just a bunch of boards in an Oriental pine, is a source of pride for the neighborhood kids who built it.

But the Westlake Island Property Owners Association says it's an eyesore, and it's got to go.

"We don't want to tear it down," said a disheartened Matt Gephardt. The 10-year-old boy helped build the treehouse with Gary Jacobs and some other neighborhood friends in the back yard of Mary Jacobs.

The junior builders had tried to avoid trouble and please the adults by honoring a ban on construction before 7 a.m. and on weekends.

But that wasn't enough.

Karyn Shaudis, head of the association's architectural committee, said treehouses are not mentioned in the rules, but added, "If it's ugly and if it's visible from the water, it's going to have to go."

The neighborhood of $500,000 homes sits on an island in a man-made lake in the city of Westlake Village, about 35 miles northwest of Los Angeles.

Two-headed serpent

A two-headed Great Plains Rat Snake was donated to Sunset Zoo by Deb Stockton, Summerfield, who found it in her basement. It is rare for such a phenomenon to be seen because normally they would die in the wild before they are seen, Zoo Curator Mike Quick said. The snake will be used in the zoo's educational department if it stabilizes and survives. The snake was donated Oct. 4.

House approves proposal on tallgrass prairie

Park Service opposes proposal, says ranch too small

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — A decades-old dream of conservationists moved a step closer to reality Tuesday as the House approved a proposal to create a tallgrass prairie preserve in Kansas.

The legislation, passed on a 284-121, would establish the Flint Hills Prairie National Monument and make it a part of the national park system.

Under the measure, the government would buy the 11,000-acre Z-Bar Ranch near Strong City in Chase County. The National Park Service would operate it as a public park to preserve the prairie and as a model of a historic cattle ranch. The site is about 130 miles southwest of Kansas City.

"The tallgrass prairie is the most distinctively American land form, and this monument could be one of the most important preservation projects in the country," said Rep. Dan Glickman, a Wichita Democrat and chief sponsor of the measure.

"The Z-Bar Ranch ... is a national treasure and we should treat it as such."

At present, there is no national park devoted exclusively to preserving the tallgrass prairie. But the proposal has split the Kansas congressional delegation as well as area residents.

Opponents argued there was no need for the government to own the land because ranchers were adequately preserving the prairie in Kansas and there was no threat it would be lost to crop cultivation or development.

"Finding tallgrass prairie in the Midwest is about as difficult as finding a traffic jam here in Washington," said Rep. Dick Nichols, a McPherson Republican whose congressional district contains the ranch.

Local ranchers as well as farm groups such as the Kansas Farm Bureau and Kansas Livestock Association oppose the proposal. They fear the government might try to expand the preserve in the future or control how ranchers manage adjoining property.

Rep. Pat Roberts, a Dodge City Republican, spoke against government ownership, saying the prairie "will continue to be preserved if we can avoid both federal involvement and the masses of visitors that could come" to a public park.

Proponents emphasized the ranch owner, a bank in Kansas City, was willing to sell the property to the government. In addition, the legislation prohibits the government from using its power of condemnation to acquire any property.

him look so distraught was on television during his hearings."

Despite the allegations, Carter said she believed Thomas would be confirmed. She said she thought he was more than qualified to be a Supreme Court justice.

Thomas was always objective in his opinion of others and helpful to his staff, she said.

"I have had personal conversations with him about continuing my education, specifically about relocating to Kansas to study at K-State," she said.

He encouraged her to contact him for assistance in that endeavor.

Carter worked at the EEOC for two years as administrative assistant in the offices of Communications, Program Operation-Program Support Services and the Vice Chairman.

Aggie business soars on game day

Saturday considered busiest day in two years, Last Chance employee says

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

Aggieville businesses faced a flood of customers after the K-State-KU game brought in spectators all night long Saturday.

"It was probably the busiest day we've had in the past two years," said Marvin Peck, Last Chance Restaurant and Saloon employee. "I expected something to get broken — at least a window."

Businesses reported little or no vandalism. Last Chance tried to alleviate problems by serving all beer in plastic cups rather than glass bottles.

Many business owners and employees said the lack of vandalism wasn't surprising due to the large number of police officers called in to help monitor Aggieville.

Burger King Assistant Manager Renate Bailey said she was surprised no property damage was done — after having the doors of the restaurant kicked during riots in past years. The restaurant also took steps to keep illegally parked vehicles out of its parking lot by having an employee direct traffic Saturday.

Two elections make no sense

Student Senate has finally made up its collective mind about when to conduct elections. At least, one would hope it has made up its mind after three tries.

This year, there will be two elections. One will be this fall through which students will select a new Senate and student body president.

A second election is scheduled for spring 1992, when the students will again elect a new Senate. But a new student body president will not be elected until spring 1993.

The decision to have a student body president in office for 18 months was made, ostensibly, to provide the needed overlap between the two Senates.

But really, it's a tacit admission of what has become apparent throughout the recent furniture flap — Senate considers itself inefficient and allows one person with a cabal of advisers to do its work.

Further, the decision was made to bring the timing of K-State student government elections in line with those of the other Kansas Board of Regents schools.

Sounds like a good reason. Maybe the United States can bring its election times in line with Britain's or Paraguay's.

Also, the change is intended to elect senators who will be more experienced when it comes time to force student organizations seeking funding through the hoops of Senate's allocation process.

The current system seemed to be working fine — if the desired result was petty bickering and the non-funding of every so-called "political" organization except for the College Republicans.

It's even more surprising since the decision will take away power from those experienced senators who have the most axes to grind and who have been so kindly guiding the junior senators in their allocations work.

Unfortunately, once again, Senate makes no sense.

Misplaced Riley and Geary don't belong in 1st

A task force of the Kansas Legislature recently revealed its proposal on how to redraw the state's congressional districts.

The districts are being redrawn because Kansas, based on the 1990 Census, has lost the population base to continue having five congressional districts.

Under the proposal, the 5th Congressional District will be done away with. The 2nd District, in which Riley and Geary counties are now placed, will be extended into the southeast corner of the state.

Along the way, however, a couple of counties will be removed from the western edge of the Second and added to the eastern border of the 1st Congressional District.

Care to guess which two counties?

Yep, Riley and Geary will be added to the 1st District, which primarily represents western Kansas.

Interestingly enough, Douglas County is also being removed from the 2nd District and added to the 3rd Congressional District, which represents the Kansas side of the Kansas City metropolitan area.

It seems the 2nd District, which has represented the northeast corner of the state for some time, is in for some changes. Might it be because 2nd District Rep. Jim Slattery is a Democrat?

No, that couldn't be. If that were the reason, it would be gerrymandering, and we don't do that in Kansas.

Opinions in opposition

Competitions on campus go further than football

We are an endlessly divisible people. The various competitions involved in Homecoming last week are evidence of our willingness to take sides.

Of course, the big thing was the game. The feud between K-State and the University of Kansas is eternal: us and them in what sometimes seems to have become a big ego battle.

That game is the moment we all turn into football fans.

Tickets for the K-State-KU game nearly sell out every year. But the game doesn't represent the competition between the teams so much as the competition between the schools.

Homecoming isn't just a competition between schools, either. It becomes a competition among Greeks, residence halls and others as well.

There were several contests on campus last week. The residence halls competed by building displays. The Greeks had their contests as well.

But not every contest on campus was related to Homecoming, or was an activity in the spirit of good old American competition.

The "chalk wars" that were given attention in an Oct. 11 Collegian editorial are perhaps the most recent glaring example of the darker side of divisibility.

Although the editorial dealt with the pro-choice vs. pro-life debate, the abortion conflict was not the only war on campus sidewalks last week.

The Bisexual and Gay and Lesbian Society was chalking on campus as well. That group's sidewalk advertisements were desecrated by graffiti painted by people with opposing viewpoints. In at least one place on campus, the words "Fags must die" had been put over a BaGaLS announcement.

ERIC BECKER

Such action (on the part of those who oppose the BaGaLS) is not only malicious and insensitive, but passive-aggressive as well. Obviously, any confrontation between people with opposing viewpoints on such a serious and emotional question must be controlled. But until some real confrontation — some real communication — takes place, there is no chance for people to resolve their differences.

But perhaps the competitions of Homecoming week should be considered when we plan what are too often our unfriendly contests with people who do not think as we do.

William James wrote about what he called the "moral equivalent of war." James accepted (as we all must accept) that there seems to be something competitive in human nature, and that on some level, war serves that inherent instinct.

What he suggested in response was that we should strive to discover the moral equivalent of war — that is, some activity that serves our inherent competitive natures, but does so in a constructive fashion.

Football may be one such device, but we need others to deal with the serious questions we must face in 20th-century society.

One nation under Frank

Republicans, Democrats leave us no choice

JASON HAMILTON

It's getting to be that time — when my friends and I who try to regularly watch the news clench our collective teeth and prepare to deal with the unpleasantness of a presidential race.

Mercifully, unlike the last two or three elections, there is still little hoopla in October. Last time around, I remember having to wade through more news segments and campaign advertisements than I could shake a stick at as early as September.

In fact, the lack of activity is rather strange. Perhaps everyone just assumes Bush has no chance of being ousted by anyone, especially the Democratic candidates who have announced their intentions to run.

This campaign may not amount to much, and I think that is a very bad thing. What this country needs right now is a presidential race that shakes everything up.

My roommate believes in many of the traditionally conservative views on government. He thinks government should play as little a role as possible in the lives of the citizens. In this respect, he is almost conservative enough to be libertarian.

He always votes Democrat, however. He explained it to me while we were watching CNN Thursday. He said Republicans, by nature, are people who tend to endow and apportion, fund and set up bureaucracies. He doesn't vote for the people he agrees with, because the end effect is the opposite.

The Democrats, on the other hand, are incompetent, he said. They may want to interfere in all levels of society with pseudo-socialistic programs, but they end up bumbling it. Therefore, my roommate claims, if you want to limit government, keep voting Democrat.

This is all good and well, as far as it goes, but it seems no one is going to make a dent in the Republican lock on the executive branch anytime in the next few years.

My roommate agrees with me. We need a race that will shake up everyone and everything.

All hope is not lost for this. An alternative, admittedly a weird one, has presented itself. Everyone who wants to put the fear of God, or at least of the people, into the two major parties should vote for Frank Zappa.

I don't know for sure if he is officially running, but I hear rumors he is. The sheer thought of Zappa as a candidate throws my more mainstream acquaintances into fits of laughter.

Zappa will never be president of the United States, and many people are thankful for that. I think, however, that if small campaign groups from across the nation support him, he could win a few percentage points in the final popular vote.

That's all I really ask for, too. Anything more than 5 or 10 percent would scare the powers that be to the marrow and make them aware that the media-brainwashed masses still have a little power in choosing their government. It might change the way they view their roles in a democracy.

And if, God forbid, Zappa should actually win, it would not be an entirely bad thing. Most people I've talked to seem to think Zappa as president would be the worst thing that could happen to America.

I don't really see why, though. All the established power in the other branches of government would unite to oppose Zappa's radical plans, and he would get very little done.

Someone told me other countries would think the United States was weak if we were to elect Zappa, and they would declare war on us. I don't, however, see any nation brave enough to take on a country with Zappa's unsteady finger on the trigger to the largest nuclear arsenal in the universe.

Zappa would do no harm, and besides, he will never be elected. He can only shake up the powers in place.

So, if you think your vote doesn't count and the people in power don't listen to your kind, send them a message they hopefully can't ignore. Vote Zappa in 1992.

A win healed wounds

How does that old saying go? Isn't it something like, "It doesn't matter if you win or lose, but how you play the game"?

If that's true, then why do we keep score?

For the last four years, I have kept score. Before Saturday's victory over KU, K-State's combined record in basketball and football against the Jayhawks is 3-10-1.

But the football victory on Saturday made all the money that was spent on season tickets worthwhile. The Wildcats were the winners. Players, coaches and fans could all hold their heads high as the weekend drew to an end.

Obviously, there were many heroes in the game — quarterback Paul Watson with his fourth-quarter passing and Andre Coleman with his game-winning catch. How about Brooks Barta with 17 tackles or the whole defensive unit for containing KU tailback Tony Sands and keeping the game close?

Sands, who entered the game averaging 146 yards per contest, was limited to 29 yards on 13 carries on Saturday.

There were plenty of people to be proud of on the gridiron, but there were equally as many people to be proud of off the field.

K-State's coaching staff did an outstanding job in the game. The defense was as good as any team in the country last Saturday. KU could only manage to score 12 points despite six turnovers. Coach Bill Snyder deserves much of the credit for not allowing his players to get down on themselves and never giving up — goals he has preached since his arrival.

Fan support was outstanding as well. There were 40,856 fans who paid to see the game, the largest K-State home crowd since Nebraska and many of its fans came to town during the Cornhuskers' near-national championship season of 1983.

No one could question the fans' enthusiasm Saturday. The stadium was louder than I have ever heard it. And despite a plea to not run on the field, you knew the goal posts were coming down.

The fans' spirit was great, but it got even better as the night progressed.

The last time K-State beat KU in football, a riot followed in Aggieville. Several windows were busted and a car was overturned on Moro Street.

Riley County Police took no chances this year and closed the entrances to Aggieville to vehicular traffic at North Manhattan Avenue and 11th Street.

There was no riot. In fact, police were quite surprised at how cordial the crowd was following the game.

K-State and Manhattan were definitely winners last weekend. The football team pushed its record to 4-1 for the first time since 1969. Snyder and his coaching staff notched their first-ever victory over the Jayhawks, and the crowd responded in a positive manner during the game and after.

It was a huge victory for K-State. Fans can now sit back and wait until basketball season when that competitive spirit will resurface between two intrastate rivals.

Saturday, there were no losers, just winners. Oh, yeah — except for the KU Jayhawks and the lame television commercial that promoted the game.

Senior Mary Jo Miller listens to K-State coach Susan Yow's instructions during the Lady Cats' first practice of the 1991-92 season Tuesday in Bramlage Coliseum. Miller, who is already the career leader in assists at K-State, will be expected to be one of the team leaders.

Miller assumes role of leader

Veteran's play will be a key

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

The 1991-92 version of the Lady Cats will be very different, but there is one constant — Mary Jo Miller.

After the departure of all-Big Eight performers Nadira Hazim and Diana Miller, who combined for 37.9 points per game last season, one would think Mary Jo Miller will have her hands full guiding a team filled with youth and little experience.

"I haven't really thought about it that much yet," Miller said. "Maybe I'll have some (pressure), seeing as I'm a returning senior, and it'll be a challenge to lead a group of kids."

Miller comes into this season as one of the elite players in the Big Eight. But that status could leave her as a target for opponents all season long.

"I'm sure they'll be looking to change my game, seeing as I'm the one with all the experience," she said. "But a lot of things could change during the season. If someone on our team gets hot, then they'll have to guard them, too. That will help my game."

Coach Susan Yow said she is also expecting a lot from her senior point guard, but no more than she would from anybody else on the team.

"To put that much pressure on her would not be fair to her or the team," Yow said. "We have to stick with the team concept and go after each game one at a time."

Yow said, however, that Miller's experience to this team is almost invaluable.

"She's been a starter for about three years now and that kind of experience just can't be overlooked," Yow said. "I haven't been able to watch the team so far, but I believe she's been working hard toward getting ready for this season."

Last season, Miller led the team in assists with 175 — 100 of which came during conference games, establishing a Big Eight record.

Heading into her final season, Miller is first on the career assists chart with 446 and fourth in career steals with 208. She also holds three of the top six season assists marks and had the fourth most steals (79) in a season last year.

"She's just one of those players who has a lot of talent and determination," Yow said. "She sees the floor so well, and she will do almost anything you ask of her."

Miller also established herself off the court, earning academic all-Big Eight honors with a 3.10 average in elementary education.

After losing several top performers from last season, the Big Eight will face some parity this season. With that in mind, K-State has a chance to fare well in the conference.

"A lot of it depends on how the young kids develop throughout the beginning of the season," Yow said. "We do have a young team, and we'll have to see how they develop."

There are six freshmen and one junior transfer among the 13 players listed.

Miller acknowledged that the newcomers will have to come along quickly if they are to have a successful season.

Cricket traditions practiced

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

Playing a game over several hours, or even days, makes a sport unusual. But having a break for lunch and another break for the traditional afternoon tea gives the sport a unique aspect.

The sport is cricket. And it's played at K-State.

Cricket is a popular sport in Great Britain, Australia, South Africa and Asian countries such as Pakistan and India. It originated in Britain, where farmers played the game for relaxation.

K-State students have played cricket for the last four years. The KSU Cricket Club is one of the newest club sports at K-State and has about 25 members.

Club member Ahmad Tariq said the club faces problems that prevent the members from having regular practices.

"We can't play in a cricket league because we don't have a ground at K-State where we can play," he said.

Tariq, a native of Pakistan, said for the team to compete in a league in the Midwest, it must be able to play host to other teams. The lack of a playing ground has made that impossible.

"We have tried to get a proper ground, but the University doesn't have one," he said. "They offered us to play on the field across from the (Chester E. Peters) Recreation Complex. But after a while, they didn't let us play there anymore because we sliced the grass with our cricket bats."

The members, who are mostly from India and Pakistan, now practice in front of Moore Hall. The basketball court outside of Moore serves as a weekly practice ground each Friday.

"Actually, we don't practice properly," Tariq said. "We play with a tennis ball because playing with the hard cork ball would be too dangerous for other people walking around."

The club is always looking for opponent, which Tariq said is hard because other teams are busy with league games. But from time to time, the team is able to play.

"We played KU four times and Kansas City once," Tariq said. "Despite the handicap of not having a practice ground, we have beaten KU twice."

In addition to facility problems, the team has had difficulty purchasing the expensive equipment needed for cricket.

Tariq said he joined the club to enjoy his favorite sport, which is a national pastime in Pakistan much like baseball is here.

"I started with cricket when I was 6 or 7 years old," he said. "In Pakistan, everybody plays cricket. The little kids start to play cricket everywhere, like on the streets."

A cricket team consists of 11 players. The object of the game is for the batsman to hit the ball pitched by the other team as far as possible. If the batsman hits successfully, he exchanges his position with the second

Computer puts K-State ahead of Nebraska

SCOTT PASKE

Take a shot at this one: Guess which team will enter Saturday's K-State-Nebraska game ranked higher by the New York Times?

You get one more try if you guessed the Cornhuskers. "Not yet," wide receiver Michael Smith said. "No way. If we beat Nebraska, then maybe ..."

The news caused mixed reactions from K-State players when they were informed at Tuesday's weekly press conference. Running back Eric Gallon laughed. Free safety Jaime Mendez thought it was a joke.

Coach Bill Snyder looked as if he wished he wouldn't have heard it. "I didn't know that we were and I can't respond," Snyder said of K-State's No. 19 ranking in the weekly computer poll. "I just hope (Nebraska's) Tom (Osborne) doesn't see that and relay it to his players."

The Wildcats admitted to feeling emotionally high after Saturday's 16-12 win over KU. What they weren't ready for was a national ranking.

"It hasn't been that easy to come down, because everybody was so up, so emotionally exhausted," Mendez said. "A couple times in practice the other day, I heard guys say, 'Hey, the KU game is over. It's time to get ready for Nebraska.'"

K-State was ranked earlier this week by the same computer that placed KU sixth in the country two weeks ago ahead of Associated Press Top 25 poll leader Florida State.

The Jayhawks lost their next two games. "A computer said that?" Gallon said when told of the Cats' ranking. "Well, you can throw that out the window."

The computerized poll makes a couple of allowances in its figuring that most likely benefited K-State. It disregards runaway games like the Cats' 56-3 loss to Washington on Sept. 28, and places more emphasis on recent performances.

Other teams that have made their way into the unique poll that aren't in the current AP poll include East Carolina and Texas, which has a 2-2 record.

K-State is tied for 19th with Colorado. Nebraska is 21st.

"Everybody's got an opinion of who should be ranked where," Smith

Mendez said the thought of Nebraska players viewing the poll didn't concern him.

"You don't ever want to give anybody bulletin board material," Mendez said. "But it's not like we did it."

Hoop tickets to go on sale

K-State season basketball tickets will go on sale Thursday, Oct. 17, at the Ahearn Field House ticket office. They will be available from 9 a.m. to 5 p.m. weekdays through Nov. 1.

The cost for a student season ticket will be $80 for 17 home games, including two exhibition and eight non-conference games plus the seven-game Big Eight Conference package.

Students who want to purchase tickets need to bring their current semester fee cards. All of this year's student season tickets will be general admission. The general public and faculty can also order their season tickets at Ahearn, in addition to regular K-State ticket outlets, including Bramlage Coliseum.

Morgan accepts job with Pirates

K-State assistant baseball coach Phil Morgan has accepted a position with the Pittsburgh Pirates as the major league club's area supervisor for the Midwest.

In his new position, Morgan will oversee the Pirates' scouting efforts of the six-state region covering Arkansas, Oklahoma, Missouri, Kansas, Nebraska and Iowa. He will resign his position at K-State effective Nov. 1.

"Professional baseball is on the upswing, and the opportunity to work for one of the top organizations in Major League Baseball doesn't come around very often," Morgan said.

Morgan will work under the supervision of Jack Zduriencik, the Pirates' Scouting Director.

"Phil is energetic and a guy with a lot of polish," Zduriencik said. "He has experience recruiting players, which certainly adds to his scouting ability. Phil knows what makes players tick, and he gives us a base in the Midwest because he's worked in the area his entire career and has a lot of contacts."

"We're excited about the opportunity to work with Phil, and he'll be an asset for us."

Queensrÿche to rock Bramlage Coliseum

Heavy metal concert includes animation, film

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian Reporter

The heavy metal band Queensrÿche will be in concert at 7:30 p.m. Nov. 21 at Bramlage Coliseum.

Tickets will go on sale Saturday at the McCain Box Office, the K-State Union Bookstore, the Manhattan Town Center and the Bramlage Box Office.

Ticket prices will be released later today when official concert details are released.

Queensrÿche recently had its first top-10 hit, "Silent Lucidity," from its first top-10 album, "Empire," according to Billboard magazine.

"Empire," the band's fourth full-length album, went gold, selling 500,000 copies, within four days of release last September.

It took one year for its last studio album, "Operation: Mindcrime," to reach gold-record status.

Queensrÿche at Bramlage

- The concert will take place at 7:30 p.m. Nov. 21 in Bramlage Coliseum.
- Tickets go on sale Saturday at the McCain Box Office, K-State Union Bookstore, Manhattan Town Center and the Bramlage Box Office. Prices will be announced later today.

In its first headlining tour, Queensrÿche's "Building Empires 1991," will incorporate film and animation with musical works from its albums "Operation: Mindcrime" and "Empire."

In October and November 1990, the group toured Europe with many of the dates selling out.

In January, Queensrÿche performed at the Rock in Rio II festival in Brazil. The band then performed in Japan with several sold-out shows.

The band is made up of musicians Geoff Tate, Chris DeGarmo, Michael Wilton, Eddie Jackson and Scott Rockenfield.

Warrior Soul, veterans of tours with Metallica, Danzig and Soundgarden, will be the opening act at the Queensrÿche concert.

Warrior Soul has had two albums "Last Decade Dead Century" and "Drugs, God and the New Republic."

"Last Decade" was voted best new album in many year-end top 10 magazine polls. It also reached the top 10 on many metal album charts.

The song "The Losers," a single from "Last Decade" was voted best metal song in College Music Journal's 1990 reader's poll.

Gladiator tryouts Saturday

Winners to compete for $50,000 in prizes

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian Reporter

Someone in the Manhattan area could win over $50,000 in cash and prizes during the American Gladiators National Finals in Atlantic City.

Tryouts for the Manhattan-area gladiator competition will be Saturday, 5 p.m. in the Brandeberry Sports Complex adjacent to Bramlage Coliseum.

The tryout will consist of a physical fitness test, which will include sit-ups, chin-ups and 40-yard dashes. Anyone 18 years old or older is welcome to try out.

Application forms for the tryout will be available at all Shop Kwiks and Bramlage Coliseum ticket outlets. Participants may also apply the day of tryouts at the sports complex. There is no cost for the tryout.

Those who pass the tryout will compete against the American Gladiators Nov. 14.

Nitro, Gemini, Gold, Zap, Lazer, Blaze, Thunder, Ice, Malibu and Diamond will battle opponents in the powerball, atlasphere, joust and the eliminator as shown on the syndicated television show.

The top eight female and male winners in the tour will compete for the title of "American Gladiators Live Tour National Champion" at the Trump Hotel and Casino in Atlantic City.

Tickets for the Nov. 19 contest will go on sale Saturday at the usual ticket outlets.

The concept of the American Gladiators was created more than 10 years ago by Johnny Ferraro and Dann Carr in Erie, Pa.

in K-State's budget last year and this year, but he said no one can say what the Kansas Board of Regents will recommend as far as program alteration.

"The ball is in the regents' court, and they have decided nothing yet," he said.

"Anything we do here will be at the direction of the regents, and all faculty, all departments, and all colleges will have input."

Brooks agreed and said the whole University should be involved in any program changes.

"The whole community should get together and decide what we can be rather than what we don't need," he said. "We need as much program diversity as we can cultivate. We're all enriched by diversity."

Wefald said the central administration is meeting with the eight colleges but only to look at the University's mission statement.

members have been approached by students upset that it will take longer to graduate due to filled classes.

"A young woman comes into my office in tears because it will take her five years to be a teacher," she said. "Someone else took her space in a class and then dropped."

Registrar Don Foster said dropping classes later also causes a backlog problem.

"If a chemistry lab fills up and later 20 percent of the students drop, that 20 percent need to take the same lab the following semester," he said. "This develops a backlog of students."

Weis said often the University, however, is to blame for schedule changes because its budget has been cut, and only a limited number of classes can be offered.

"It's too hard to figure who dictated the schedule problem, he said. "I have a feeling most of the time it's the University."

Derek Thoman, Student Senate representative to Faculty Senate, said his constituents have said charging a fee is unfair.

"They've already paid their fees," he said. "They may have other reasons for dropping a class. If the reason is caused by the University, it's not fair to charge students."

Kenneth Brooks, faculty committee member, agreed but said most legitimate reasons for dropping a class are known within the first two weeks of school.

"I don't necessarily like the idea of another fee and certainly not for the first couple of classes dropped," he said. "If a decision can be made to drop in the first two weeks, there should be no fees, but there is a legitimate reason for a fee after that time."

Thurston said she is going to contact the Executive Committee of Faculty Senate for more information before her committee discusses the issue any further.

"They referred this agenda item to us, but we can't look at it unless we know exactly what the concerns are and who is expressing them," she said. "We need the information before we investigate or decide there is no need to investigate."

"But which direction and to what end?" he said.

wasn't surprising given recession-related budget problems affecting more than 30 states.

"The current recession has had an impact on all sectors of education, public and private," he said.

A recent Associated Press survey found that 17 states cut spending for higher education this fiscal year. Twenty-one others raised spending by less than 5 percent.

And public campuses in at least 21 states have increased tuitions by at least 10 percent.

Among the steepest in the AP survey: the University of Oregon, up nearly one-third to $2,598; the University of California system, up 40 percent to $2,274; and the 64-campus State University of New York increased tuition by $500 to $2,150 a year, following a $300 rise last December.

SIG EPS—Homecoming came and went. If we stayed around much longer, we'd have to pay rent. Rides to class and waterguns, interviews with the Collegian, wasn't that fun? "Green Acres" is the place to be. I'm really not that fat. Peewee! Stop throwing grass. It gives me a rash! But to sum it all up, we had the "Time Of Our Lives" dancing at Charlie's, getting home at sunrise. Homecoming '91—we had a lotta kickin' fun! Who says it has to end? Let's party again! Love—the Diehards: Tamara, Beav, Missie and Citty.

THETAS—THANK you so much for all of your love, support and encouragement. You guys are the best! Love, Paula.

TO THE Women of Gamma Phi Beta: At your house a big UFO landed, it left some wild ATOs stranded. That Wednesday night in October, the ATOs shacked, some drunk, some sober. In your yard we were dancing and singing, and off your roof, underwear was slinging. Thursday night we started to pump, after that we preceded to romp. The following Sunday the comedians came, we knew then things wouldn't be the same. Monday and Tuesday went by in a flash, the rest of the week turned into a bash. On Thursday night preliams were here, we placed in both, let's drink a beer! The float was judged Friday afternoon, the week was ending way to soon. Then bodybuilding. Yell like Hell, and Pant the Chant were finished, the fear of losing was almost diminished. Saturday morning came much, much too early in the parade, we made our K-Statement, surely. That afternoon, the sky was bright and blue, the Cats came back to stomp... KUI! When it was all said and done, ATOs, Gamma Phi, and KSU were number one!! Love, the Men of Alpha Tau Omega.

Man opens fire in Texas cafeteria

22 killed in mass shooting; gunman's motive unknown

By the Associated Press

KILLEEN, Texas — A man smashed a pickup truck through a restaurant window Wednesday and fired on the lunchtime crowd with a high-powered pistol, killing 22 people in the deadliest mass shooting in U.S. history, authorities said.

The gunman later killed himself in a restaurant bathroom, police said. The man shouted, "This is what Bell County has done to me!" before opening fire on customers and employees at a Luby's Cafeteria.

At least 20 others were wounded, hospitals reported. One Luby's employee, Maria Serna, 41, was treated for hypothermia after she hid in a restaurant freezer for 2½ hours, unaware it was safe to come out, said Metroplex Hospital spokesman Ricky Seiler.

The restaurant, part of a chain of 151 cafeterias in nine states, is particularly popular with older people. It was jammed with lunchtime patrons Wednesday, including some who were there for "Boss's Day" celebrations, witnesses said.

Killeen Police Chief F.L. Giacomozzi said he had no idea why the man went on the rampage. There was no immediate explanation of what grievance the gunman had against Bell County, where Killeen is situated. Another witness, Angela Wilson, said he yelled about Belton or Dayton, both nearby communities.

News reports Wednesday night identified the gunman as George Hennard, 35, of Belton, but police wouldn't confirm that.

Six hours after the shootings, bodies remained in the restaurant. A refrigerated truck had pulled up outside. Victims were to be transported to Parkland Hospital in Dallas for autopsies.

The gunman fired rounds from a semiautomatic weapon for about 10 minutes, then apparently shot himself in the head, said police Capt. Roy Stover.

Wilson, 24, who had just arrived for work, said she was among about 100 people in the cafeteria when the blue pickup shattered the plate-glass window.

Giacomozzi said the gunman was wounded by police, but he was unsure how many times he was hit. His body was found in a restroom.

Killed were 14 women, eight men and the gunman, Giacomozzi said. One victim, Pat Carney, was director of elementary curriculum for the Killeen Independent School District, Superintendent Charles Patterson said.

"The guy jumped out of the truck and said, 'This is what Bell County has done to me!'" said Sheldon Smith, a porter at the Luby's Cafeteria. "As he opened fire, the guy that he ran over with the truck was trying to get up and he shot him."

"Then he pointed toward the line where the service was, and he started shooting down the line."

Twenty-three people were dead, including the gunman, Bell County Peace Justice Robert Stubblefield said. At least 20 people were wounded, hospitals reported.

The gunman "entered the business at 12:41 and began firing rounds from a semiautomatic weapon," said police Capt. Roy Stover. "Shots were fired for approximately 10 minutes. At 12:51 we were notified the gunman was dead at the restaurant. He apparently shot himself in the head."

Authorities haven't released his identity. Sam Wink, a Killeen resident who was in the restaurant, de-

Landfill remains open despite KDHE order

Deadline extended until new location found; contamination to be monitored

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

The Riley County Landfill has remained open despite an order by the Kansas Department of Health and Environment that it must be closed because of contamination.

"About four years ago, the landfill was first ordered to close by June 1991," said Chuck Linn, chief of Solid Waste Management Inspection for the KDHE. "But they asked for and got an extension, because they didn't have any other place to put the refuse."

He said the deadline was extended indefinitely, because the KDHE was confident that the landfill will stop receiving trash within the next 60 days.

The landfill, at Hunter's Island south of Manhattan, has been the center of controversy for several years.

In 1985, cancer-causing agents were found in the groundwater in residences surrounding the landfill, which resulted in a lawsuit. And in 1988, diesel fuel was dumped in the landfill against regulations.

"The landfill will be closed as soon as we can temporarily transfer the waste to either Topeka or Perry, which is near Lawrence," said Monty Wedel, planning special projects director for the Solid Waste Management Committee.

"The state ordered the Riley County Landfill to close because of the contamination of ground water, and it's also getting full. There has been a landfill site there since 1963."

"For people who live downstream and have private wells, there's a problem with drinking the water," he said. "The city will supply water to them, and then strictly monitor the contamination to figure out how to clean it up."

"We will be responsible for that for many years. If worse comes to worst, we'll have to pump the water out and treat it. And that could be very expensive."

The funds for this cleanup would come from trash bills, Wedel said.

Diane Brummett, B and L Trash Service owner, said these costs would be passed on to the service's customers.

"Our dumping fees have gone from $2 to $9 per cubic yard in the past three or four years," Brummett

Landfill waiting to close

■ Closing deadline extended indefinitely.

■ Predictions are the transfer station near the current landfill will be ready in early 1992, but the landfill will not be closed for another year.

said. "That costs us about $180 per truckload. Right now, I imagine all trash services charge their customers between $11 and $14 a month."

The Solid Waste Management Committee chose Perry over Topeka as the transfer site Oct. 14, and a contract is being negotiated.

"The Perry site is already developed, and the shale is thicker, better and more impermeable," committee chairman Richard Jepsen said.

Jepsen said he predicted that by the beginning of 1992, the transfer station, which is located near the Riley County Landfill, will be ready for use. Then, he said, it might take another year to close the landfill.

Riley County policeman Bill Schuck checks the serial number on the car of Kristina McCain, freshman in education, which was hit Wednesday by a train at 24th Street and Ft. Riley Boulevard just south of K-18.

Car collides with train

Freshman not injured in crash; car totalled, minor damage sustained to train

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

A K-State freshman was not injured when her car was totaled in an accident with a train at about 5 p.m., Wednesday one mile west of the Manhattan Municipal Airport.

Kristina McCain, freshman in education, said she does not remember anything about the accident.

Patrol officer Bill Schuck of the Riley County Police Department said McCain was driving north on 24th street when her 1979 Chevrolet Impala was hit by the train driven by Randy Schneider of Overland Park.

It took the train about 50 yards to come to a complete stop.

McCain said she was returning to her home in St. George from a salvage yard where she had just purchased a rear window for her car.

"The window wasn't broken in the accident," she said. "I wonder if I can get my money back for it." She said she received the car Monday as a gift from her fiancé's father.

The car was knocked 66 feet from the point of impact, and caused minor damage to the train's strut and gas tank, Schuck said.

"It would take a dump truck full of gravel to do any real damage to a train," he said. "She is lucky she wasn't killed in the accident."

McCain was issued a ticket for failure to yield to oncoming traffic after stopping at a posted stop sign.

Rape: it's not always a stranger

Editor's note: The names in this story have been changed to protect the privacy of those involved.

RAPE

Julie had thought she would like to date John. They had even kissed before.

They lived on the same residence hall floor as freshmen and would leave notes on each other's doors.

It took her a long time to call what he did to her "rape."

Two years ago, after Midnight Madness, John knocked on Julie's door at about 2 a.m.

They sat on her bed and talked for a while, and then he began to kiss her. Julie didn't mind at first, but soon kissing wasn't enough, and he pressured her to give him more. She was getting scared, but she was too stunned to even think about fighting him off. Besides, he was a former wrestler, and Julie had a slim build.

But she did ask him to stop. As Julie talks now, she crosses her legs and arms, speaking in a low but steady voice.

"When I told him he was hurting me, he said 'It'll only hurt for a little while,'" Julie said, twisting her hands and looking at them. "He told me to relax, and he told me to stop crying. If I made noises, he'd say 'Shh.'"

"I could see what was happening

Victims lose ability to trust, change behavior, environment

Though the traditional image of a rapist may be the stranger in the dark, women are most likely to be raped by someone they know.

RAPE

While both stranger and acquaintance rape are traumatic, a certain brand of guilt is attached to being raped by an acquaintance, boyfriend or husband.

"What's particularly devastating about acquaintance rape is the loss of one's self-confidence and ability to trust other people," said Judy Davis, director of the K-State Women's Resource Center.

According to the 1985 Ms. magazine Campus Project on Sexual Assault, 25 percent of college women have been the victims of rape or attempted rape. Of these, 84 percent knew their attackers.

Kent State University psychologist Mary Koss interviewed more than 7,000 students at 35 randomly selected U.S. colleges for the study.

Angie McClure, sexual assault services coordinator for the Manhattan Crisis Center Inc., said rape victims often change their behavior and environment after the attack.

No rape is easy to recover from, McClure said, but an acquaintance rape victim's life may be more drastically affected. Many make changes as small as walking to class a different way to avoid seeing her attacker, or as big as moving out of town.

Davis said, "Recovery from rape translates to making changes in one's life."

After the attack, she said, victims

Kansas Senators vote for Thomas

Local feelings mixed on justice's confirmation

While both Kansas senators voted in favor of the confirmation of Supreme Court Justice Clarence Thomas, reaction on campus was mixed.

Sen. Nancy Kassebaum, R-Kan., said she found Anita Hill to be credible and the charges to be serious.

"Charges of sexual harassment are difficult to prove and extremely difficult to defend against," Kassebaum said on the Senate floor. "No man can or should be required to prove he is innocent, certainly not 8-10 years after the fact."

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., also voted in favor of the confirmation and said he thought the ordeal may even have strengthened Thomas.

"In my view this will make Judge Thomas even a better judge, a stronger judge, than earlier indicated," Dole said to the Senate. "Having gone through another test of his strength and his character, in my view he is in a stronger position."

Some students said they disagree with the senators' votes.

France, Germany propose unified army

PARIS (AP) — France and Germany said Wednesday they planned to create a joint 50,000-member army corps they see as the foundation of a future European army. Britain called the force "dangerous" and a threat to NATO.

The plans by Bonn and Paris gave new impetus to the drive for political union in the 12-nation European Community while highlighting rifts ahead of a EC summit in December.

France and Germany outlined their plans to create a Strasbourg-based corps with up to 50,000 men in a letter to Dutch Prime Minister Ruud Lubbers, whose nation holds the EC's rotating presidency.

The two countries currently have a symbolic joint brigade of 5,000 soldiers.

States need federal help, says lawyer

WASHINGTON (AP) — State, not federal, courts should deal with clinic-blocking abortion protesters, the Bush administration told the Supreme Court on Wednesday. A lawyer for clinic owners said recent protests in Wichita showed "states need federal help."

The high court has a Virginia case under study, but lawyer John Schafer offered a vivid reminder of the upheaval in Wichita caused when Operation Rescue targeted abortion clinics in that city.

Hundreds of the anti-abortion group's members were arrested.

At issue is the availability of federal courts when abortion clinic owners sue for monetary damages or to bar future blockades.

Marlatt Hall residents camp in tents Wednesday night behind their hall in protest of Athletic Department's decision to cancel the campout for season basketball tickets. The residents participating plan to stay camped until this afternoon — unless they have too much fun and decide to stay.

Students camp to show support

Basketball tradition continued by Marlatt, West residents

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

"The flag is up and the campout for basketball tickets has begun."

Tyson Porter, senior in industrial engineering, said that is what he told people on the telephone Wednesday afternoon.

Even though the traditional campout for tickets was eliminated last spring, Porter said he and Philip Perkins, junior in hotel and restaurant management, decided to organize a campout to show support for the basketball team.

"Someone mentioned the players don't see the support that's out there that a campout normally shows," Porter said.

Porter said he jokingly called people he has camped with in past years and told them the flag was up. He and Perkins then set up tents on the west side of Marlatt Hall.

"We thought about camping next to Ahearn Fieldhouse but weren't sure if we would be allowed to stay overnight," Porter said.

About 30 Marlatt and West Hall residents were signed in the logbook at 9 p.m.

Porter said he was going to do a roll call just for fun to see how many people were at the camp later in the evening.

Both Porter and Perkins said the elimination of the campout and the introduction of general admission seating would cause changes this season.

"Now that a lot of people will have general admission tickets, they may go to the games early to get good seats," Perkins said. "We used to get there 3-4 hours before the doors opened."

Porter said he wasn't sure if the changes would drastically affect ticket sales.

"I'm absolutely convinced that a lot of people who wouldn't have otherwise bought tickets did so because of the campout," Porter said. "But the opportunity to have general admission tickets may attract interest."

Defining harassment not easy

State commission investigates discrimination charges

VICTORIA CHERRIE

Ninety-seven out of 1,121 employment complaints made to the Kansas Human Rights Commission in 1990 were sexual harassment allegations.

The variety of sexual harassment complaints and levels of discrimination make a simple definition of sexual harassment difficult to ascertain. With an unknown origin, harassment cases become sensitive situations.

Kim Blubaugh, executive director for Manhattan Crisis Center, said most women are used to being sexually harassed because no one ever teaches the true definition.

"Our job here at the Crisis Center is not to determine if the reason was sexual harassment by legal definition, but to help the victim that was affected," Blubaugh said.

"I think sexual harassment is the continuum of violent acts, depending on the extent of what goes on," she said.

She said that most trauma victims of sexual harassment and domestic violence come in 24 hours after the incident, but it is not unusual to hear from the victim a year after the incident has happened.

According to the 1991 Kansas State Faculty Handbook, sexual harassment is any behavior which, through inappropriate sexual content or disagreement of members of one sex, interferes with an individual's work or learning environment.

Don Weiner, Manhattan attorney and former students' attorney at K-State, said it is important that discrimination is defined because every form of discrimination is not considered actionable from a legal point of view.

"People need to be keyed into the nature of discrimination according to creed, color and national origin," Weiner said.

Weiner said there are many levels and types of discrimination, therefore strong evidence and heavy investigative work is needed to find the truth.

"The nature of the facts is related to the types of harassments and the levels," Weiner said. "These cases can be related to a person being hit or at work, a climate of sexual timidity or perhaps jokes of sexual connotations."

Robert Lay, assistant director of Kansas Human Rights Commission said most sexual harassment cases deal with unwelcomed sexual advances.

has so many controversial issues surrounding him, others should have been considered for such a prestigious position," said Jeff Emmot, senior in marketing.

Adrienne Carter, graduate student in counseling and personal services and former employee of Thomas at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission, said the ugliest element of the hearings was the leak of information that caused two fine individuals to be paraded unnecessarily in front of the media.

"I hope the issue of the information that was leaked and those responsible will be dealt with in the same aggressive manner," Carter said.

Sandra Coyner, director of the Women's Studies Program, said even if the Senate knew the truth, sexual harassment is politically unpopular as are other women's issues.

She said she didn't think the Senate Judiciary Committee took Anita Hill's information seriously when it was first made available to them and it was wrong to have the dispute on national television.

"The White House is masterminding the Republicans who have protected Thomas and made speculations on Hill's character," she said. "She's not a monster, and she has been made to look that way."

Coyner said that since Thomas is a conservative black man, which is rare, Bush and other Republicans have protected him.

"There is no reason a person with a cloud of sexual harassment over his head should hold such an important position," she said.

Some minorities criticize Thomas' stance on Affirmative Action. He does not support the policy, which both minorities and non-minorities have said is hypocritical because Thomas himself has benefited from Affirmative Action.

"My hope now that he is confirmed as Justice, is that he will be a very strong advocate for social justice," said Mordean Taylor-Archer, assistant provost for multicultural affairs.

Wrong way down
'ONE WAY' bad play

Campus street signs are there for a reason.

When you see a white arrow with bold, black letters spelling out the words "YAW ENO," you know there's a problem. It means you're going the wrong way down a "ONE WAY" street.

At the very least, people will point at you and laugh. At the very worst, you will run into another car or even a pedestrian.

Campus police can't be everywhere at all times. And just because a police car isn't in sight, the rules still apply. If you think taking the "short cut" is OK as long as you don't get caught, you're wrong, and dangerously so.

Several people report they have been forced off the narrow campus streets — both while walking and driving — by someone zipping down a "ONE WAY" the wrong way.

Let's take it upon ourselves as responsible citizens to follow traffic laws — and follow "ONE WAY" arrows. Campus police catch a lot of flack, often times from us, but even they shouldn't have to spend all their time chasing down illiterate race car drivers who can't follow the simplest rules.

Visa lottery 'winners' have luck o' the Irish

Call it the luck o' the Irish.

The new AA-1 Immigrant Lottery Program, which began Monday and ends Sunday, is supposed to make up for a previous discrepancy caused by the 1965 immigration reform legislation.

The 1965 legislation "adversely affected" 34 countries by cheating them out of their fair share of immigrant visas.

So now they get to catch up. And one country, Ireland, seems to get a better chance than the other 33 countries involved.

The law that created the AA-1 lottery specifies that 16,000 or 40 percent of the visas must go to natives of the Irish Republic and Northern Ireland. Sen. Edward Kennedy, D-Mass., co-sponsored the 1990 law.

The world might be wondering what makes Ireland so special. Could it be the fact that Kennedy is of Irish descent and that Boston has a big Irish constituency?

Putting his own personal bias on such a law is ridiculous. It only creates yet another discrepancy. It leaves the other 33 countries to fight over the remaining 24,000 visas.

It's like buying a lottery ticket only to discover the grand prize has already been promised to someone else.

This kind of lottery seems as rigged as a high-school beauty pageant.

Thanks, senators, for showing us that the real world is just as we expected and feared — it's all in who you know.

Only the tip of the political iceberg

Thomas hearings prove entire confirmation process has problems

SHAWN BRUCE

Now that Clarence Thomas has been confirmed to the nation's high court, the Senate will take a few days or weeks to catch its breath. Then, senators will turn their attention to another question.

That question is whether or not the whole confirmation hearing process needs overhauling.

Obviously, President Bush and other key Republicans think it does. They've argued that the whole process is now controlled by special interest groups and carefully orchestrated negative public relations campaigns.

Put simply, they seem to be arguing that the truth has become secondary to political gains and concerns.

And in some respects, they're right.

At best, Anita Hill's claims were suspect. Ten years is an awful long time especially after considering that she followed Thomas to other jobs and stayed in contact with him.

But the Democrats were struggling for something — anything — keep Thomas out. The Hill affair was made big, perhaps it was even blown out of proportion. The reason, put simply, was for political concerns.

But before Bush adopts a holier-than-thou attitude and criticizes the Democratic party, he needs to go back and take a look at his own record. How quickly he has forgotten.

Who can forget his famous (or infamous) Willie Horton campaign? Through a carefully orchestrated public relations campaign, Bush managed to use racism, an unreal fear of crime and outright lies to turn the tide against Michael Dukakis.

Why? To become president of the United States of America. That certainly fits into the definition of political gains doesn't it?

Or flash forward to Bush's war on drugs. Bush went on television to show the American people a bag of crack cocaine that was seized by police in a park right across from the White House.

What Bush didn't tell the American people is that officials from the Drug Enforcement Agency basically lured a drug dealer to Lafayette Park, a place where there had never been an arrest for crack before.

But if Bush had gone on television and said, "Here's some drugs we seized in a set-up operation (also called entrapment)," it wouldn't have served his political agenda.

There's no blame for that. The world of politics is a war fought by public relations firms rather than armies, and the first casualty of such a war is always the truth.

War usually involves two parties. And to find fault with your enemy for using the same tactics you do is ridiculous.

Probably the most oft-repeated phrase by Republicans in Washington, D.C., this week has been, "People who live in glass houses shouldn't throw stones."

But in the world of politics, everyone — be they Independent, Republican or Democrat — lives in glass houses.

And if someone throws a rock at you, you've got to throw one back at them — at least if you want to survive.

LETTERS

Way to go, Cats

Editor,

This letter is to Coach Bill Snyder and the K-State football team.

I just wanted to say thank you for a job well done. In the four years I've been here, I've never been more proud to call myself a K-Stater. I watched you play in front of a full house without giving up — even when we were behind 3-12 in the fourth quarter. I can't tell you what an impact you have on us when we see you on the field waving your arms around, trying to get the crowd pumped up.

Your hard work, dedication and determination are what has helped to turn this football program around and bring you to where you are today. It hasn't gone unnoticed or unappreciated.

Thank you for Saturday's victory over that other team from Kansas.

Best of luck at Nebraska this weekend. Go Cats!

Pot hardly a 'wonder weed'

Editor,

Do people have nothing better to do than lament the illegality of marijuana? Is the Collegian so starved for news it has to give this subject attention two or three times a week?

These people make the plant seem like a "wonder weed" that can solve all of the nation's problems. Maybe the plant isn't as terrible as some reports have stated, maybe it is. I really don't know; I really don't care.

If people really care about the problems of society, they ought to volunteer their time for worthy causes such as the homeless, the elderly or the Big Brother/Big Sister program rather than whine about not being able to legally experiment with a mind-altering drug.

Get real, people. Go out and help someone. Get off the self-indulgence kick.

Pot statistics show effects

Editor,

Regarding marijuana as a gateway drug, here are some statistics from the 1986 National High School Survey on Drug Abuse.

■ 60 percent of marijuana users have their first experience between the sixth and ninth grades.

■ 84 percent of adolescent current coke users are also current marijuana users.

■ 98 percent of all people who have tried cocaine have used dope.

Message ruins blue jean wearer's day

Editor,

Friday, Oct. 11, started out a little better than most days. I was in a good mood and not all that late for work. Then I found out that by wearing my blue jeans to work on campus, I was showing my support for the bisexual, gay and lesbian community here at K-State. Well, wasn't that just precious.

Don't get me wrong. I do not openly discriminate against these types of people. I do not care what they do, how they do it or who they do it to as long as they use protection and it is between consenting adults. I do, however, take great personal offense against someone else deciding what my actions mean.

If the BaGaLS wanted support for their cause, they should have told people in advance what to do so we could decide which way we wanted to throw our support, but they didn't. How dare they? If this didn't make people upset, it should have. As I said before, I do not discriminate, but I absolutely would not support them or their cause.

If the BaGaLS feel so bad about themselves they think they have to drag everyone else down, maybe deep down they think what they are doing is wrong, and they are just trying to make it right in their eyes.

Harmony editorial misses point

Editor,

This is in reference to the editorial "Harmony: Week packed with opportunities for all," which appeared in the Oct. 8 Collegian.

Frankly, I was left wondering what the Collegian was trying to say in the paragraph dealing with international students. Either that whole paragraph is a case of bad English or it is a case of ignorance on the part of the Collegian's editorial board as to what Racial/Ethnic Harmony week is about.

The editorial went on to preach about prejudice, ignorance, misinformation, etc. I think the Collegian can do a lot towards educating the campus about the diversity reflected in our campus. This requires a lot of commitment and consistency on the Collegian's part. Unfortunately, it is found wanting in this respect.

I would like the Collegian to practice more of what it preaches to others. When the Collegian came to the Student Senate for money, it talked about how it reaches so many people, how it disseminates information, how it tries to reflect the diversity in our campus, etc. Each time a new editor takes over, the promise is made that the Collegian will be more sensitive to the diversity of the campus. Initially there are some articles and coverage like we have been seeing during the past two weeks. Then things will go back to square one.

This is especially true of the Collegian's coverage of international students (who comprise about 9 percent of the student body), their organizations and the functions organized by them. There are so many international organizations actively involved in campus activities. The Collegian can make a good start towards broadening its coverage of international students by contacting these organizations and writing about their activities. Then it can go about covering these activities as they occur. In this way, people will know more about these events and there will be more participation and understanding.

Rainmakers prefer breakup

Gweedles perform at Snookie's tonight; band hopes for recording deal

JANE ROESNER
Collegian Reporter

The Rainmakers' fans will be disappointed if they are hoping the band will somehow find its way back together again.

"I think that band is dead," said Steve Phillips, former guitarist and vocalist for the Rainmakers.

He said Pat Tomek, drummer, is in Kansas City playing with various bands and Rich Ruth, bassist and vocalist, had moved to Nashville in order to play with Webb Wilder.

Bob Walkenhorst, lead vocalist and acoustic guitarist, was not interested in getting back together either, Phillips said.

Phillips is now a guitarist and vocalist for the Gweedles, which performed at the Welcome Back Concert this year and will be performing tonight at Snookie's.

Phillips said he really enjoys playing with the Gweedles.

"I have a lot of fun with this band," he said. "I have a lot of fun with the Rainmakers too, but we get crazier in this band. I love it. I love the songs. I love these guys."

At the time of the Welcome Back Concert, the Gweedles had been recording for three months and had demos for seven songs. Phillips said the band had been working in Chicago, so several club owners there as well as record companies, management firms and publishers were interested in the group.

"So it's just a matter of time, I think, before the band gets a record deal," he said.

Phillips said although he enjoyed playing with the Rainmakers, he wanted to concentrate on the future of the Gweedles.

"I want to talk about this band, you know," he said. "This is what I'm doing now and I'm having a blast."

Troy A. Wedel, an alumnus who attended the Welcome Back Concert, said he was an avid Rainmakers fan and the Gweedles just didn't measure up.

"By far the best songs they did were the two that Steve Phillips sang," Wedel said. "They have a long way to go to compare with the Rainmakers."

Formerly known as Steve, Bob and Rich, the Rainmakers had performed at several Welcome Back Concerts since 1982. Phillips said they toured with Kansas for a year and opened for major acts such as the Doobie Brothers and INXS.

Cut-A-Thon to aid local center

Hairdressers cut 400 heads of hair for charity

CARY HASSELL
Collegian Reporter

The 7th Annual Hair Experts Cut-A-Thon will take place this Friday at 9 a.m.

Nine hairdressers will cut approximately 400 heads of hair in one day, which breaks down to one shampoo, cut and style every 15 minutes.

Lynn and Jim Ward came up with the idea of a cut-a-thon seven years ago. They wanted to do something that would be both a challenge and a benefit for the community.

Last year $3,600 was raised, and their goal this year is $4,000.

Haircuts will be $12, a $7 to $13 difference than the regular prices of $18 to $25.

All proceeds go to Big Lake Development Center, a private, non-profit, community-based agency serving developmentally disabled preschool children and adults 16 and older in Riley, Clay and Pottawatomie counties in Kansas.

The design team will consist of nine hairdressers, two assistants and three people working the front desk.

Five Greek organizations are also donating their time; Kappa Delta, Sigma Sigma Sigma, Sigma Phi Epsilon, Pi Beta Phi and Delta Tau Delta. They will shampoo and sweep up hair and also be in charge of door prizes that have been donated from various Manhattan businesses.

The cut-a-thon begins at 9 a.m. and ends at 9 p.m. Walk-ins are welcome.

Weiner said these cases need extensive investigative work, because the facts govern the law and one fact out of line for cause of action can cause a victim not to have a case.

"One of the biggest problems isn't just the evidence that is needed in these particular cases, but we can't take action until people make the complaints," Lay said.

Lay said complaints can be made to the Kansas Human Rights Commission by letter, phone call or personal visit in Topeka or Wichita.

Similar complaints by faculty and students on campus can be made to the University administrator of the department in which the incident took place, the Affirmative Action Office or the Dean of Student Life.

Victims are asked to provide detailed explanations in an interview with an administrator and to receive follow-up calls from the interviewer.

According to the K-State Faculty handbook, both the complainant and the person against whom the complaint is brought will be fully informed and have a full opportunity to be heard.

Avery blanks Pirates again; Game 7 tonight

By the Associated Press

PITTSBURGH — The Atlanta Braves finally scored, and even though it was only one run it was enough for Steve Avery.

Avery pitched like a 21-year veteran rather than a 21-year-old and the Braves broke their scoreless streak at 26 innings on Greg Olson's two-out double in the ninth off Doug Drabek to beat the Pittsburgh Pirates 1-0 Wednesday night, forcing the NL playoffs to a seventh game.

As Ron Gant scored the winning run he stopped and stared at home plate as a Brave crossed it — without missing third base — for the first time since the first inning of Game 4.

It was the third 1-0 game in this series after just four previous 1-0 games in the 22-year history of the NL playoffs.

Now, John Smoltz, baseball's winningest pitcher since the All-Star break, will try to extend Atlanta's improbable season when he faces 20-game winner John Smiley on Thursday night in a rematch of Game 3 starters.

The Pirates have played five deciding Game 7s in their post-season history and won every time, all in the World Series.

Avery shut out Pittsburgh on three hits through eight innings for a playoff record 16½ consecutive scoreless innings and Alejandro Pena relieved to start the ninth. Pinch hitter Gary Varsho led off with a sinking single, was sacrificed to second and took third on a two-out wild pitch to Andy Van Slyke.

But Pena got his third save of the series when, as he did in Game 2, he stranded the tying run at third base in the ninth inning, getting Van Slyke to look at a changeup for strike three.

Avery allowed just nine hits and struck out 17 in his two outings. He is 2-0 in the playoffs, 4-0 against the Pirates this season and 20-8 overall.

Drabek showed no ill effects of the hamstring he strained running out a hit in Game 1 and shut down Atlanta on six hits for eight innings.

But in the ninth, Gant drew a one-out walk, stole his playoff record sixth base of the series with two out and scored on Olson's double down the left-field line.

The Braves, who stranded a runner on third base with one out in the third, blew two big chances much later. In the seventh, Gant led off with a single, stole second and took third on a groundout. But Gant was easily thrown out at the plate by shortstop Jay Bell on Olson's two-hopper with the infield in.

Lonnie Smith doubled with one out in the eighth but was stranded when Jeff Treadway grounded out and NL batting champion Terry Pendleton flied out, leaving a runner in scoring position for the fourth time in the game.

Avery struck out the side in the first inning, as he did last week, and fanned five of the first six batters. Don Slaught led off the third with a single to left field, making him one of the few Pirates to pull Avery, but was easily thrown out when he tried to turn it into a double.

Avery worked around a leadoff walk to Bobby Bonilla in the fifth and did not allow another hit until Jose Lind began the sixth by slicing a single to right. Drabek was the next batter and Pirates manager Jim Leyland put on the sacrifice — to get a runner to second, and prevent Drabek from swinging away and getting any funny ideas about running around the bases.

It was the Braves' shot at showing good defense, however, as catcher Olson made a diving catch on Drabek's popped up bunt in front of the plate, and Sid Bream made a nifty turn at first for a 3-6-3 double play on Gary Redus' grounder.

While Avery was overpowering the Pirates, Drabek was deceiving the Braves.

Atlanta managed only four hits through six innings off Drabek's off-speed pitches. Plus, the Braves were faced with a bad omen from the start.

Smith opened the game with a double off third baseman Steve Buechele's glove and took third on a groundout by Treadway, playing for the first time in the series after being sidelined with a sore hand.

Adjusting quite well

Wuggazer learns old college tricks in debut season

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

Billy Wuggazer is like most freshman athletes. He's learning lessons. What's separating him from a lot of others his age is how he's applying his knowledge.

"I don't think he really knew what to expect of himself," K-State cross country coach John Capriotti said. "He's been as good as any freshman we've had. But he can still get better."

For now, Wuggazer is doing the things that help a team achieve success — following the leaders and holding his own against counterparts from other teams. The Phillipsburg native sparked a runaway victory for the Wildcats at the Loyola Invitational by finishing 13th overall as K-State's No. 5 runner.

"It was a little bit of a surprise," Wuggazer said. "I thought it would take at least a couple more races for me to figure out how to run at this level."

Wuggazer's biggest adjustment this season has been adapting to the longer college-race distances. At the high school state track meet last spring in Wichita, Wuggazer captured titles in the 800-, 1600- and 3200-meter races.

The race distance at the Loyola Invitational was five miles.

"He really came to us almost as a sprinter," Capriotti said. "Sometimes it's really hard for guys who aren't used to running that distance to make that adjustment."

To aid in the transformation, Wuggazer competed in several road races during the summer. He said the experience with 10-kilometer distances has made fall training easier.

"I took a couple of weeks off, but Coach Capriotti had me start building up miles," Wuggazer said. "Now, it's been a case of learning to do the little things like maneuvering through the pack at the start of a race to get in position by the end of that first mile."

Capriotti, who discovered Wuggazer while at a high school meet watching another freshman, Jeanene Rugan, said his young runner still needs to develop a stronger frame of mind in races.

"It's this way for a lot of fresh-

TODD FEEDBACK/Staff

Freshman Billy Wuggazer has made the adjustment to longer college-race distances. He finished 13th at the Loyola Invitational.

men," Capriotti said. "It's more of a psychological thing. It's one thing to think you can do something, and another to actually go out and do it. Billy's trying to find himself in that sense."

Wuggazer, who chose K-State over Brown and Stanford, was expected to be redshirted this fall. But an injury to senior Phil Byrne forced Capriotti to insert Wuggazer into the Cats' first meet, the Wichita State Invitational.

"It seemed like it was a couple of minutes before the race, he asked me what I wanted to do," Wuggazer said. "I told him I'd rather run now, so if something would happen on down the line like an injury, I'd be able to take the redshirt then."

"It's worked out well so far. I'm just trying to improve my times and help the team."

Coyle adds to game

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

How can you draw up a better scenario for the nucleus of a women's golf team than having your top two players' stroke averages under 82?

The K-State women have been faced with that question for more than a year now, and they finally have an answer.

That answer, provided by Theresa Coyle, is to have a third player step up to the level of the top two performers. Valerie Hahn and Adena Hagedorn have carried the load, and, until now, it's been lonely at the top for the one-two tandem.

But help arrived from Coyle, a senior who lowered her stroke average from 86.5 last spring to 82.8 this fall. Her emergence was one reason for the solid season posted by the Wildcat women this fall.

"Last year, she could play," Coach Mark Elliott said. "She hits the ball solidly and was one of our best ball strikers, but her short game was pitiful. She just didn't have any confidence. She has really improved that part of her game."

"Golf is all mental, and she just has more confidence in her game now. She's started to get good results, 84-83 at Iowa State and 83-78 at the Roadrunner Classic. Ever since New Mexico, she thinks she can break 80 every time out."

"I think it's just a lot of hard work that's finally paying off," Coyle said of her improved play. "I've gained a lot of confidence now, but if you don't have confidence in your swing, you're going to struggle."

The highlight for Coyle occurred when she posted a team-high fifth-place finish at the Shocker Fall Classic. Her heroics were instrumental in K-State capturing the team championship at that tournament, the Cats' first victory in more than three years.

The fall portion of the season had its bad side, however, as Coyle was bothered in the final tournament by a past injury that caused tendinitis to flare up in her wrist.

"It started hurting two weeks ago, but we got rained out at Northern Illinois," Coyle said. "It kept hurting last week and got worse before the Iowa tournament."

"The scariest part is that no one knows if it will get better."

Coyle said she will have to rest her arm for some time before she will be able to rehabilitate it. If the wrist doesn't improve, Coyle said she fears having to restructure her swing.

With K-State applying an all-out effort to climb out of the Big Eight cellar, a place it has occupied for 15 years, Coyle is gathered to make one last run during her career.

"I would like to end my four years here well, and the Big Eight is the key to that," Coyle said. "The biggest motivation is breaking out of the cellar. The women have never done it."

"Looking at the football team's progress, we hope to get in on that improvement. We just want to be able to say we broke out of last. It's like we're doing it for all of the girls who have ever played here at K-State."

Coyle still has bad memories of her past Big Eight tournaments, but said she is hoping this will be the breakthrough year.

"K-State's history is a hard thing to shake," Coyle said. "You realize you weren't responsible for the other years, but you're fighting yourself on every hole."

FAN FORUM

Richards says thanks to fans

Editor,

On behalf of President We-fald, Coach Snyder and our entire football team, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate our student body for their behavior throughout Homecoming week, including their tremendous support in our victory over Kansas last Saturday.

Your support throughout the game was certainly a contributing factor to our team's terrific comeback in recapturing the Governor's Cup, much like the roaring crowd that got behind the Kansas City Chiefs in their big win over the Buffalo Bills last Monday night.

Prior to my appointment here, I heard many stories about previous riots in the Aggieville district, which caused us to take several precautionary measures in leading up to a game of that magnitude. Thankfully, those steps were not needed because of your tremendous cooperation and the efforts of Chief Charles Beckom of the K-State Police Department, Alvan Johnson of the Riley County Police Department and Tony Van Buren of the Kansas Highway Patrol to make last weekend a success.

I am truly honored to serve as your director of athletics and I look forward to a continued strong relationship with our fine student body.

I hope to see you at all of our sporting events. Your attendance at all our sporting events certainly makes a difference.

Tarpley's chances run out with NBA

No drug test spells doom for Dallas player

By the Associated Press

DALLAS — Roy Tarpley became the seventh player to be banned by the NBA for life under the league's anti-drug agreement, but the first permanently dismissed for refusing to take a drug test.

Gary Bettman, counsel for the NBA, said Wednesday that the Dallas Mavericks forward refused "repeated attempts" by the league to get him to take the test after he missed practice on Tuesday.

"His refusal to take the test speaks for itself," Bettman said. "He knew it was strike three."

Tarpley was informed of the ban in Houston at the John Lucas Center but had no immediate comment.

Mavericks owner Donald Carter said, "It's stupid. It's stupid that somebody who has that kind of talent would let this happen."

Tarpley, who was to make $3 million this year, forfeits his contract under the anti-drug agreement between the league and the NBA Players Association.

He can reapply for readmission to the league in two years.

Three of the previous six players banned for life were reinstated after the 2-year period and one, Mitchell Wiggins, is currently with the Philadelphia 76ers.

"I believe he had some real problems ... man and woman problems, life problems," Carter said.

"The problems with Roy were the most difficult of any I've ever been involved in," coach Richie Adubato said. "Of course, it's a major problem that a fine individual like Roy has such problems."

Rick Sund, Mavericks vice president of operations, said "this was probably good for Roy and good for the team. We would have loved to have Roy but he became a distraction. It reached the point where if he wasn't going to follow the prescribed treatment then he needed the third strike. It would have been a trying situation with him on the Mavericks this year."

Tarpley, who also missed team practices on Sunday and Monday, refused to take a drug test as required by the league.

Huskers bring bulk back to offense

Bigger linemen help running game return to old form

By the Associated Press

LINCOLN, Neb. — Bigger is better again at Nebraska, where offensive line giants had been a tradition each football season for decades.

Sophomore Lance Lundberg is among the hulking Huskers who added weight and strength from last season after Nebraska coaches last spring all but abandoned a two-year plan to produce leaner, quicker blockers.

"The offensive line worked out hard all summer," Lundberg said. "We put on quite a bit of weight per man, and just the strength and weight has maybe helped us move some people out of there."

The result of having seven 300-pounders in the three-deep offensive line shows in the statistics. Nebraska leads the nation in rushing after a 4-1 season start, getting an average of 361 yards per game against Utah State, Colorado State, Washington, Arizona State and Oklahoma State.

The ninth-ranked Cornhuskers will have another sizeable advantage Saturday when K-State comes to Lincoln. The Wildcats' starters on the defensive front line weigh 230, 265, 275, 265 and 205. Nebraska counters with a line checking in at 305, 300, 275, 295 and 310 pounds.

Lundberg is the starting left tackle for the Huskers. The 6-foot-4, 305-pounder from Wausa, Neb., shares playing time with 6-5, 305-pound freshman Doug Zatechka.

"Rob is big, he's strong, he's fast, he's got all the tools," Lundberg said. "Right now both of us are learning the mental aspect of football and the line. We're trying to learn the system completely."

Lundberg actually didn't figure on seeing as much playing time as he has been getting in his sophomore season. Traditionally Nebraska line starters are fourth-year juniors or fifth-year seniors.

"This year I thought my role as a sophomore would be, if I played or

Here's the beef

Despite more size in the defensive line from past years, K-State will still be at a huge disadvantage against Nebraska's offensive line.

- Lance Lundberg, 6-4, 305, soph., LT
- Erik Wiegert, 6-5, 300, sr., LG
- Bill Ziegelbein, 6-4, 275, sr., C
- Will Shields, 6-1, 295, jr., RG
- Brian Boerboom, 6-7, 310, sr., RT practiced well, I'd back up Erik (Wiegert) and get to play some, not a lot," Lundberg said. But the progress of the younger players allowed Cornhusker coaches to move the senior Wiegert to left guard.

Lundberg said the experience has been pleasing and the adjustment easier because veterans are playing alongside him.

"The older guys in the line give you a feeling of confidence because they're sure of what they're doing, and that attitude or feeling is catchy," he said.

But he also admitted to having a mental lapse in the season's only loss, the 36-21 setback against third-ranked Washington.

"I can't speak for the whole line, but I feel I kind of psyched myself out and didn't play my kind of game," he said. "Not to take anything away from Washington, because they were an excellent team. But I think I played mind-games with myself and didn't play up to my ability."

Julie had been a virgin before that Saturday night. She said what was happening to her wasn't immediately clear.

"You don't react like you say you would," she said.

Before he left her room, he said to tell anyone who asked that they had just talked. After he left, she put on her pajamas, got into bed and cried. Later, she got up to shower because she felt dirty, she said.

Julie never called the police. She didn't even tell her roommate.

Feelings of guilt and shame colored her perception of the rape.

"I definitely felt like it was all my fault, that something I did made him feel that's what I wanted," she said.

"If it's someone you know and someone you really like, I think it's harder than if someone just jumps out of the bushes. I think it's less physically damaging, but emotionally it's harder."

The next morning, John left her a note saying he didn't want a relationship — he just wanted to be friends. She could tell he had no idea what he'd done. It seemed he thought it was a mutual encounter.

"He knew he hurt me, but he didn't think it was a crime," she said.

At first, Julie tried to pretend nothing had happened, but it didn't work.

"There were times I'd sit up in my room and think of the least messy way to kill myself," she said.

Once, she took all the aspirin she had, but since there were only four of them she wasn't hurt.

The only person Julie told about the rape was a friend of hers in Germany who finally convinced her to talk to a counselor. Two months later, she went to University Counseling Services.

But she stopped her sessions after a while. Now, she says she thinks she wasn't ready to deal with the rape so soon and just wanted it to fade away.

"I didn't think people would believe me, or they would blame me," she said. "I wasn't ready to deal with it."

About a month ago, Julie returned to counseling on a regular basis.

"I tried to put it out of my head, but for two years of doing it, it wasn't going away," she said.

Julie said the incident made a strong impact on her personality.

"When I was first up here, I was really independent. Now, I'm afraid to go in my apartment by myself. Especially at night, it's really hard," she said. "Even when I'm doing my homework, I don't like to be by myself."

Since the rape, Julie has been more cautious about dating. She only goes out with men she knows fairly well.

Though she knows in her mind the rape was not her fault, Julie said she still feels tugs of guilt.

"I know it's not my fault, and I know all the facts, and I know I couldn't see it coming. But I just feel there are things I could have done differently," she said. "I was kissing him at the beginning, but I didn't want what happened afterward."

The rape also raised Julie's awareness of relationships and standing up for herself.

She said women and men need to discuss what they want out of a relationship before they get involved.

"Don't be selfish — don't. If you really care about the person, you'll take the time to find out what they really want. Don't assume anything," she said.

Julie said no one deserves what she went through.

"No matter what, they never ask for it," she said.

Nutrition low on grocery lists

Quick foods are popular items; students unconcerned by health factors

MICHELLE POULIN
Collegian Reporter

Sometimes studying takes priority over eating in a student's life, and several grocers in town say nutrition is not a priority in students' food choices.

Mark Brenner, general store manager of the Food 4 Less on Humboldt and 5th Street, said quick-to-prepare foods are selling the best.

"Frozen pizza — they eat a bunch of that," Brenner said. "We are selling large amounts of microwavable foods as well as the traditional things like Ramen noodles."

Eric Sutton, grocery manager for the Dillon Store in Westloop, said he estimates business has picked up more than 25 percent since the fall semester began.

"All of our departments have noted a large increase in sales," Sutton said. "Milk is a good example. During the summer, we were going through six to seven pallets of milk per day. Now we are going through nine to 10 pallets per day. One pallet is equivalent to 45 cases of milk."

Sutton agrees that microwavable foods are selling well, but he said his store is selling a lot of items like cookies and crackers that don't require any preparation at all.

Amy Glynn, sophomore in architecture, admitted to enjoying junk food.

"I eat a lot of macaroni and cheese," Glynn said. "I have no concern about health food and enjoy drinking large quantities of pop. But, I do like to cook meat dishes. It's just hard to find the time to do it."

Many students find it hard to find any time to eat at all.

"Sometimes I'll notice it's 3 p.m., and I haven't eaten since yesterday at 4 p.m.," said Craig Goodman, junior in fine arts. "I am really busy but also concerned about eating right. I try to eat the healthy food out of the vending machines and occasionally a hearty meal of Ramen noodles."

Kathy Reno, senior in accounting, said she is concerned about too much junk food and tries to stay away from it, but for certain foods she will indulge.

"I drink at least one pop a day and eat a peanut butter-no-jelly sandwich for lunch," she said. "For supper, it's a lot of hamburger dishes like spaghetti. I have to have Frosted Flakes for breakfast."

Students fortunate enough to not have empty refrigerators and freezers often fill them with easy-to-prepare meals to help save time.

The lifestyles of many college students leave them short of time and money. Inexpensive, quick and easily prepared foods are very popular.

Cities able to determine retail strength

Pull factors indicate trade attraction; Manhattan trade decreased slightly

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Some towns and cities in Kansas will soon be able to determine how much retail trade they are losing or gaining to other areas across the state.

A report on city pull factors will soon be released, said David Darling, associate professor of agriculture economics. The report was written by Darling and Fayez Tayyem, extension assistant, and is a compilation on the strength of retail trade in Kansas.

Darling said a pull factor is an indication of the strength of a business community's ability to attract trade.

He used city sales tax collection figures to develop pull factors for cities across Kansas.

Some cities are not in the analysis because they do not have a city sales tax or have changed their tax rate sometime during the last fiscal year, Darling said.

Manhattan has a one-percent city sales tax. Darling said he multiplied the amount collected from this tax by 4.25 to get the amount of state sales tax collected in Manhattan.

The city per-capita sales tax collections are then divided by the state per-capita sales tax collections to determine the pull factor.

If this number is greater than one, it means the city is attracting business from other areas and is a retail trade center.

"A pull factor of one means essentially that the retail trade potential coming from inside the boundaries of the city is being tapped 100 percent," Darling said.

Darling said the pull factor for Manhattan during the fiscal year ending in June was 1.45.

"Last year at this time, my analysis had the pull factor at 1.48 (for the previous fiscal year)," Darling said. "Essentially, the main business community has not gained strength over this period."

He said the war may be one reason for the decrease.

"The statistics would bear out a number of things that were reported over the period as being disadvantageous to retail trade," Darling said.

Randy Martin, president of the Manhattan Chamber of Commerce, said retail trade has become stronger with Fort Riley troops returning from the Persian Gulf.

"It's certainly picked up since the Gulf War," Martin said. "Retail trade was down when the soldiers were gone but became much stronger when they came back."

Martin said the Chamber is often involved with talking to companies interested in locating in Manhattan. He said economics may play a role in the company's decision.

"Some companies looking for growth may delay it because of economic factors," Martin said.

The growth of retail trade depends on the demand in the area for the particular type of business.

"Retail trade is unique in that you don't create retail trade," he said. "Retail trade goes where there is a demand — you can't create it like you can other types of industries."

The report also contains information on the population required to support a certain type of retail trade in a city. Darling said certain types of businesses are threatened when populations decrease.

He said family shoe stores and men's clothing stores are struggling in rural areas with declining populations.

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 of stranger rapists tend to avoid the conditions under which the attack occurred, such as walking alone at night.

But those who knew their assailants also feel tremendous guilt and betrayal, second-guess their actions and no longer trust their own judgment, she said.

Another aftershock of acquaintance rape is that victims approach dates or relationships more cautiously.

Victims should not become reclusive, Davis said, but they tend to think, "Who can I dare be alone with?"

The crime of rape is drastically underreported.

According to the Ms. study, more than 90 percent of women raped did not tell the police, and more than one-third told no one about their attacks.

Acquaintance rape is rarely reported because many victims don't realize what happened was rape, or they deny it.

Davis and McClure said a number of "rape myths" contribute to the victim's sense of shame and guilt.

"The single most outrageous myth is maybe the most common: 'She wanted it; she liked it,'" Davis said.

"I've never met a woman who said, 'God, I enjoyed that.' I have, on the other hand, seen a lot of devastation."

In acquaintance rape, the victim and the rapist tend to agree on the facts of the incident, but differ in their perceptions. Though the woman may feel victimized, the man may think her resistance was just "playing hard to get."

"(It's hard to believe) there could be such a disparate view about something that should be mutual, and that's spooky," Davis said.

scribed the man as 20 to 30 years old, about 160 pounds and about 5-foot-10.

The gunman wielded a Glock 9mm semiautomatic pistol, authorities said. The Austrian-made gun usually carries a 17-round magazine. The gunman reloaded his weapon and kept shooting, witnesses said. Giacomozzi said the gunman had at least one pistol but he didn't know the caliber. Glock is commonly used by police departments.

Survivors sat shaking and comforting each other outside the restaurant, which is about 1 1/2 miles from Fort Hood, a U.S. Army post.

Robert Holland, 26, a clerk at an auto parts store next to the Luby's, said he heard the truck crash through the restaurant window and then "people were running everywhere."

Wink told CNN he was at lunch with his boss for "bosses' day."

Once the shooting started, the gunman "was firing at anything he could shoot," Wink said, adding that the man had "tons" of ammunition.

The police chief said he didn't know how much ammunition the man had, but that he "wasn't out of bullets when the officers got there."

Wink escaped through a window at the back of the restaurant, he said. Giacomozzi said someone had broken the window, allowing several people to escape.

The wounded were taken to three hospitals.

House rejects bill; police look for clues

Fury against women may have triggered Hennard's massacre of 22

By the Associated Press

KILLEEN, Texas — The gunman who massacred 22 people in a 10-minute barrage of semiautomatic gunfire may have been triggered by a fury against women, authorities said Thursday.

And they said that as he exchanged shots with police who were closing in on him, the gunman saved one final bullet for himself.

Much remained a mystery about what caused George Hennard, one day after his 35th birthday, to drive his pickup truck through a plate-glass window at Luby's Cafeteria, jump out and methodically execute cowering victims with a pair of pistols. It ended in his suicide, and was the worst mass shooting in U.S. history.

Of 23 people wounded, at least 11 remained hospitalized Thursday, two in critical condition.

Fourteen of the dead were women, and residents of this central Texas town suggested Hennard was angry at women, citing a letter he had written last summer referring to "treacherous female vipers" and his comments during the rampage.

Police said they are investigating his attitude toward women.

"He has an evident problem with women for some reason, not all women," Police Chief F.L. Giacomozzi said. "We're trying to look into that to see if it can lead us to where we need to look."

Killeen is home to Fort Hood, an Army post that sent 23,000 troops to the Persian Gulf War, only 10 of whom died in combat, less than half Wednesday's toll.

Among the dead at Luby's were

Why did he do it?

■ Residents of Killeen, Texas, who knew George Hennard say his hatred for women may have caused his rampage in which he killed 22 people, including 14 women. Residents cite a letter he wrote last summer referring to "treacherous female vipers."

school administrators and educators, a veterinarian, a career military officer, a woman who was treating her daughter and granddaughter to lunch and a woman from Missouri in town for a wedding.

Flags flew at half staff as an army of counselors, clergy and volunteers tried to console residents. Luby's remained roped off, and investigators were inside. Hennard's blue Ford pickup truck was removed before dawn, but wind ruffled through the window it shattered. Outside, on-lookers milled about.

Survivors told of hiding in the restaurant freezer or jumping through broken windows. One employee spent the night in a commercial dishwasher at the cafeteria.

"He was just scared and was going to stay there," Giacomozzi said. The unidentified man was not hurt.

Another survivor, Luby's employee Vicki Large, said the tragedy has hit home. "I just see him coming through the window and shooting everywhere and it's like he's after me or something," she said Thursday.

Assault gun control rejected by House 247-177

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The House rejected a proposed ban on semiautomatic assault weapons and large ammunition clips Thursday, spurning the appeals of gun control advocates who seized upon the Texas shooting rampage to make their case.

By 247-177, the lawmakers voted to strike from a broad anti-crime bill a provision that would have banned 13 models of assault-style weapons, along with 17-round ammunition clips like those used by a gunman Wednesday to slay 22 people and himself in a Killeen, Texas, cafeteria.

Supporters of the gun control measure had taken heart when Rep. Chet Edwards announced that the massacre in a cafeteria in his home district had persuaded him to drop his longstanding opposition.

But gun control opponents noted that the proposed list of weapons that would be banned did not include the models of pistols the gunman used.

"This is a feel-good measure," Rep. James Sensenbrenner, R-Wis., said. "It is not going to affect criminals in any way, shape or form."

Supporters of the ban contended a proposed seven-bullet limit on ammunition clips might have saved some people because the gunman would have had to stop shooting to reload more often.

"The killer was in the cafeteria for over 10 minutes," Sensenbrenner countered. "He had plenty of time to change clips, and apparently he did."

Still, supporters of the ban, many of them hunters, said the Texas

Council criticizes plan

Regents' authority debated by faculty senate presidents

By the Associated Press

PITTSBURG — Centralized authority was the topic of heated debate Thursday between the Kansas Board of Regents and the administration and staffs of the six regents institutions.

REGENTS

During a board meeting at Pittsburg State University, the Council of Faculty Senate Presidents issued a harsh response to a regents report released in September regarding a strategic plan for the regents system.

"Last month, the board gave every indication that it was prepared to withdraw the staff's ill-considered and impractical plan and to work with campus representatives to develop a genuinely common, shared mission plan," said Jay Mandt, faculty senate president from Wichita State University.

"Now, on the contrary, it seems that the board insists on once again basing discussions of mission on proposals that were repudiated by every campus," Mandt said.

He accused the board of "not living up to its public promises" and creating a "climate of misrepresentation, with hidden agendas apparently at work."

Mandt claimed the regents' document proposed massive program cuts, centralization of authority in the board and faculty evaluations.

"We believed that it is vital to the well-being of the universities we serve that the board understand how divisive, confusing and destructive recent events have been for the faculties of our six institutions," he said.

Regent Donald Slawson called Mandt's statement the most controversial he had heard in his six years on the board.

But board member Charles Hostetter said he was not shocked by the statement and believed it would open the door to greater communication

Campus rape statistics low

Incidents are often not reported because of guilt, lack of awareness

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

Rape statistics compiled by the K-State Police Department show rape is almost non-existent here.

But, that's only a part of the picture.

Last year's statistics show one rape was reported to campus police, Chief Charles Beckom said.

This does not mean rape doesn't happen at K-State, Beckom said.

What it says is that rape, especially the most common form, acquaintance rape, goes unreported.

"Many people don't know they've been a victim of rape," he said. "It's an act that affects the mental perception of the victim, rather than just the physical."

It's only been in the past two years that society has really been educated about acquaintance rape, and many victims aren't aware there is some-

Actions may determine funds

Student Senate may restrict money for religious groups

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

No Student Governing Association funds will be allocated to student groups whose primary purpose is religious or partisan in nature according to a committee recommendation presented at the Student Senate meeting Thursday evening.

On another issue, Senate rejected a bill that would have allowed four polling locations for SGA elections. In the last election, there was only one polling station located at the Student Union.

STUDENT SENATE

The Ad Hoc Committee to Review Funding SGA Groups decided it would be unacceptable to discriminate during the funding process, but acceptable to limit the activities or purposes for which funds will be used.

Phil Anderson, Faculty Senate representative, asked if Campus Crusade for Christ, which was allocated money last week for a speaker on Satanism, would have been funded had this recommendation been in place.

Craig Raborn, acting committee chairman, said no.

"The speaker could have been funded, but through an educational group that was truly just an educational group," he said.

Joel Gruenke, graduate senator, said the recommendation left Senate with the same problems it had before.

"It's the same argument as last time. A group claims it is educational even though they are trying to influence," he said.

Fulcher's fate unknown at KU

Senate determined to continue business

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

The University of Kansas Student Senate is determined to conduct business as usual even though the fate of its student body president, Darren Fulcher, is unknown.

The KU Senate adopted a motion to expel Fulcher from office after it was revealed that Fulcher allegedly grabbed his ex-girlfriend by the neck and hit her in the face during an argument in February.

The expulsion motion has yet to take effect because an appeal was filed with the KU Judicial Board stating Senate violated Fulcher's right to due process.

When the board agreed to hear the appeal, it also included an injunction that allowed Fulcher to retain his office until the grievance hearings are finished.

Lance Wright, KU senator, said although Senate meetings are awkward because of the Fulcher situation, they are still productive.

"Legislation comes through with his name on it, like the mission statement, and people weren't like, 'Oh, this is from Darren so forget it,'" he said.

Wright said this is a busy time, and Senate is trying to stay focused.

"It's pretty obvious it would be strange," he said. "But the general attitude is that it's in the hands of the Judicial Board now."

Fulcher agreed that Senate is still effective but working with those who voted to have him expelled is not the ideal situation.

"I've had a little contact because we work together but no debate," he said. "We've been able to get our work done."

The Judicial Board procedure will begin with mediation.

During this phase, a mediation panel will conduct informal hearings to attempt a compromise. The panel includes three Judicial Board members, Fulcher and Senate representative John Robertson.

Fulcher said the mediation stage should commence within the next couple of weeks, al-

Eight women slain by couple in Mexico

MATAMOROS, Mexico (AP) — A couple robbed and killed eight girls and young women they lured to their rural home with the promise of work, authorities said Thursday.

During a two-month period the pair brought the victims to their home on a nearby communal farm, promising to give them money and jobs. They killed them after taking what little money they had, said State Judicial Police watch commander Eloy Trevino Gracia.

The suspects were identified as Rodolfo Infante, 28, formerly of San Benito, Texas, and Ana Maria Ruiz Villeda, 20. They were arrested

Wednesday night by Judicial State Police in this town across the Rio Grande from Brownsville, Texas.

Trevino said the couple confessed to all eight killings, but in a jailhouse interview both denied it, and each blamed the other.

"It's mostly her fault. She's the one who lured these girls to where I lived," Infante told reporters.

He said he killed three of the victims and Ruiz killed the others.

Ruiz told reporters she saw the girls killed, but didn't commit any of the murders herself. "I wouldn't kill them; he killed them," she said.

China outlaws hugging on campus

BEIJING (AP) — Young love is out at Beijing University.

School officials have banned hugging and kissing in public as an "offense against decency," and campus police are energetically enforcing the

Students and teachers said more than 100 people have been taken in for failing to contain their affectionate impulses since the ban took effect Oct. 5.

Russian to attend dedication with Dole

WASHINGTON (AP) — A Russian Republic official will accompany Senate Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., at the dedication of Bob Dole Hall, the new educational communications center at K-State during a two-day visit Sunday and Monday.

It was announced Thursday that Andrei Kolosovsky, deputy foreign minister of the Russian Republic, will accompany Dole on visits Sunday and Monday to six eastern Kansas communities.

Public meetings are planned in Humboldt, Yates Center, Fredonia and Neodesha on Sunday. The two will visit Parsons for a public meeting on Monday and then attend the dedication of the new educational communications center at K-State.

CORRECTION

The Collegian, in Monday's crime report, accidentally confused the names of two persons involved in an accident Saturday. The Collegian reported Scott E. Sheppard, 1209 A. W. 24th Street, Hutchinson, was given a juvenile detention report for transporting alcohol.

Sheppard was taken to Memorial Hospital for treatment. No report was filed.

The Collegian regrets the error.

Sober drivers goal of bars, universities

Statewide program joined by K-State, Aggieville to promote responsible action

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

K-State and several Aggieville bars today will join universities and bars across the state to conclude Alcohol Awareness Week by launching a new designated driver program.

Teaching Others Alcohol Safety Tactics (TOAST) was designed to reduce the number of students who drink and drive and encourage them to select a sober driver.

The program is funded by a grant from the Kansas Department of Transportation and is under the supervision of the Kansas Board of Regents.

Bill Arck, director of alcohol and other drug education services at Lafene Student Health Center, said he believes the new program will raise alcohol awareness wherever students go.

"We are tackling a statewide problem with a statewide solution," Arck said. "The program represents a real partnership of purpose among college students, the Regent institutions and private business to reduce alcohol-related traffic accidents in the state of Kansas."

K-State's designated driver program is designed to elicit cooperation of Aggieville bar owners to offer soft drinks or other rewards to patrons volunteering to refrain from drinking alcohol to drive others home safely.

"The thrust of this campaign is to look at the drinking and driving issue and make having a designated driver a normalcy," he said.

Arck said he would like to see the record of no drinking and driving fatalities among K-State students this year continue.

Other universities participating in the TOAST campaign include Pittsburg State University, Fort Hays State University, Emporia State University, Wichita State University and the University of Kansas.

The mentors of this program say students can play a uniquely effective role in encouraging their peers to consider and talk honestly about the idea of being a designated driver.

"I think this program will increase alcohol awareness and probably cut down on the number of DUIs," said Denny Hoelzer, junior in environmental design.

Ken Snook, manager of Snookies Bar said the idea of having designated drivers isn't really anything new for his staff, but he said it's nice to be a part of the new program.

"We were pretty much giving away beverages before TOAST was created, but now we are officially a part of the program," he said.

Promotional items such as T-shirts, cups, napkins and coasters have been distributed to participating Aggieville bars to kick-off the program.

Four-legged athletes to be drug-tested by students

Greyhounds to undergo post-race scrutiny in Abilene

JILL KIPPES
Collegian Reporter

Humans aren't the only athletes who undergo drug tests.

Veterinary medicine students will be performing post-race dog testing this week at the fall meeting of the National Greyhound Association in Abilene.

NGA has greyhound dog races semi-annually for dog owners around the United States, who will then purchase the 12-18-month-old puppies later at an auction.

Greyhound dog racing is a multi-billion dollar industry that grows each year. Dave Brosnan, who serves on the board of directors for NGA, said the industry raised over $3 billion last year.

Abilene has continued to maintain a reputation for raising winning greyhounds that race at 57 tracks around the country.

Seven hundred dogs will be raced throughout the week. First-, second- and third-place winners will then race in consolation finals on Friday.

Veterinary medicine students will collect urine specimens from each dog after the race to be examined in the lab at K-State.

This is to assure owners that dogs have not taken medication which would affect their performance. After the urine samples are tested, the results will be sent back to NGA, Brosnan said.

"I don't know of any medication that could make a dog run faster, but we need to make sure our integrity is protected," he said.

"We recently sold a greyhound for $56,000," he said. "Since we are dealing with that kind of money, NGA needs to insure members that dogs haven't taken any kind of medication to affect their performance."

He said veterinary students performing the tests are in their final years of school, and this type of study will benefit the student.

Nathan Gabbert, associate professor of clinical sciences, said last spring was the first time greyhound testing for NGA took place.

"It was a valuable experience for veterinary students, and they enjoyed it because most of them had never dealt with greyhounds before," Gabbert said.

Anxiety Composition classes write off students

Now that it is mid-term once again, freshmen all over campus can be heard raging and moaning and complaining and fretting over just one thing — their first introduction to the Portfolio System for English composition.

It is an exercise in frustration and anxiety for most participants, and horror stories from previous participants abound.

The concept is simple enough — students hand in their papers to one teacher throughout the semester, and that teacher will assign their final grade. But not until a second instructor has decided whether that student passes or fails — meets minimum standards or does not.

Certainly there must be standards and some kind of "quality control" when there are almost 100 sections of a class taught to almost everyone who comes through the University. But as it stands, the Portfolio System is a terrifying and frustrating experience for students.

Of course, those who fail make the biggest noise. But the fear of failing plagues Comp I and II students all semester and has to produce just a little performance anxiety.

The Portfolio System provides a much needed checks-and-balances system for the composition program, but somewhere along the line there needs to be more consideration of the students.

Terror may be a good motivator on the battlefield, but the object of required composition classes for nearly every major is not only to improve writing skills but also to build students' confidence in their writing abilities. It is definitely not to cause a nervous breakdown.

Peace Treatment of Nobel prize winner hardly noble

As the world watched, Aung San Suu Kyi won the Nobel Peace Prize for her attempts to lead her country, Burma, toward a free society.

She is indeed a worthy recipient and in a situation chock-full of ironies.

Even though she led the Burmese people in what the Norwegian Nobel Committee termed a "non-violent struggle for democracy and human rights," she was placed under house arrest by the Burmese government in 1989.

Even though she won one of the most distinguished honors in the world, she probably won't be released to accept it by Dec. 10. In fact, there's a possibility she hasn't even heard of her honor yet.

Let's cast this in a different light, one people can understand. What would the public do if an idolized jock was denied the privilege of accepting the Heisman trophy because he was in jail?

Sports fans would go nuts. They would demand he be freed to accept his award, though he may have been arrested for something more criminal than promoting democracy. Let's make Suu Kyi one of our idols instead of some overpaid athlete.

Suu Kyi supporters shouldn't take up arms and force the Burmese government to release Suu Kyi. That's not what the Nobel Peace Prize is all about, and it definitely isn't what Suu Kyi is all about.

But the world is watching, Burma. And we are peacefully protesting the unjust treatment of a just person.

NASA Dream of the stars

Future journeys intrigue columnist

JARED GREGOIRE

I believe I was in the sixth grade when my class, along with the rest of Whittier Elementary, was herded into the second-floor library to witness the first launch of a space shuttle — the Columbia.

I remember the relentless sense of awe as I stared at the TV screen and saw the human race's next attempt to push itself a little closer to touching the face of God.

For a little kid who only dreamed of doing such things, it was as if a doorway to another world had appeared before me, and a voice inside beckoned me to step on through.

As the shuttle rose into the blue cascade of emptiness, the voice continued to grow stronger until I felt I would burst with the anticipation of a thousand generations of childhood dreamers.

Four years later, on Jan. 28, 1986, the voice was untimely and utterly silenced as the flaming debris of the space shuttle Challenger tumbled into the Atlantic Ocean — the result of a catastrophic explosion of the solid rockets that had worked flawlessly 24 previous times.

But the silence was only a temporary thing. And after we had buried our astronauts in the Earth they had given their lives to rise above, the rebuilding of the dream began.

Their dream. My dream.

Nearly six years have passed since the Challenger exploded, and the U.S. space program has suffered more than its fair share of growing pains.

The Hubble Space Telescope, whose creators promised it would show the edges of the universe and the beginnings of time, can hardly take a clear picture of anything beyond the solar system. It'll be years before a mission can be launched to correct the problems.

The Galileo space probe to Jupiter will take years longer to arrive than originally planned. Having to use an elaborate "slingshot effect" that utilizes the gravity of Earth and Venus to propel it there instead of the usual point-and-shoot method, Galileo has left many embittered who demand instant gratification.

Then there are all the failed launchings of our regular rockets, the numerous satellites that seem to fail on a whim and the steady decline of NASA from a one-time American icon to the sorry recipient of chastisement from editorial cartoonists and critics of every degree.

To many, this demoralizing display of ineptitude would be reason enough to cast aside any dream or thought that someday we would realize le reve d'etoiles — the dream of the stars.

Not for me. With every failure I see a dozen successes, a hundred rewards. The success of Magellan mapping the surface of Venus will give scientists of all kinds years of work in unraveling the planet's mysteries and teaching us so much about our world's geologic history.

The fact that the Galileo probe will reach Jupiter despite being a bit tardy is inconsequential. It will get there, and then we may begin to delve into the secrets of the gas giants.

With each passing day, the construction of the space station Freedom becomes more of a reality. With Freedom as their base, humans will again return to the moon and someday journey to Mars.

And as Americans and Soviets lessen their desire to be apart, we may work together one day and easily go beyond Mars. Each passing day will yield discoveries that 40 years of the Cold War have effectively kept out of reach.

In the face of the 500th anniversary of Christopher Columbus' journey to this continent, it becomes strikingly clear that as creatures of exploration, we have the obligation to go beyond this world in spite of our fears and misgivings. It is what we are and what we have always been.

Whoever spread the word that the journey across the sea of discovery would be an easy one never left the safety of the harbor.

As I sit and write this — a 22-year-old college student who certainly is not the same person who sat in that library so many years ago — I still possess my dream. But now, instead of just me going beyond this world, I dream of everyone doing it — a wish that someday we may all step from the confines of this world and achieve le reve d'etoiles.

Message slasher remains mystery

Editor,

I was very disappointed in your editorial on pro-choice chalking, which makes the accusation that pro-choice people are erasing and/or scratching out Students for Life chalkings.

If you had bothered to research the subject at all, you might have noticed some inconsistencies in that accusation. The Students for Life messages with a slash through them do not list meeting times like their actual chalkings do. They do, however, say to see Union Plaza. I do not think it takes a genius to figure out that just maybe this entire series of chalkings might have the same author. Nobody was slashing out Student for Life chalkings.

In the Union Plaza, however, the author of the chalkings suggested that maybe instead of making abortion illegal, energies should be devoted to teaching sexual responsibility. His statement, however, was later rubbed out with a remark next to it saying to the effect of, "Shut the fuck up; you're censored."

It also should not take a genius to figure out that this was done by anti-choice, not pro-choice people.

Closed mindedness disgusts students

Editor,

We wish to address this to whomever felt the need to spray paint "fags must die" on some of the chalkings done by BaGaLS on Oct. 11, to those who continue to smudge out BaGaLS meeting announcements and to those who indicated on these same chalkings that these "homos" should "go home."

We realize that people like you probably don't care one way or the other, but we are thoroughly ashamed to share a place on campus with you. It frightens us because you are not bold enough to leave your name on your opinions — you could be someone we know. You could be someone with whom we work or someone from our hometowns. We feel for those people whom you are fearful of and hateful toward and wonder just how you could possibly manage to feel any sense of pride or self-worth.

We would also like to remind you that, just as you are unknown to the rest of the student body, the people against whom you discriminate are most likely unknown to you. Because of people like yourself, many gays and lesbians do not feel comfortable about sharing their sexuality with anyone else. You might be best friends with a homosexual. Heaven forbid, you might even date a person who is bisexual or is denying their true sexual orientation because of your hatred. Does it frighten you or make you angry to realize that people with whom you work or attend class may have personal lives of which you might not approve? It shouldn't. It's none of your business.

We find it saddening that your fear and lack of knowledge has surfaced at all, but it is particularly ironic that it occurred during Racial/Ethnic Harmony Week — a period of time specifically set aside to recognize the peace and cooperation that should be present among all people at all times, regardless of beliefs.

By the way, we're certain you will believe that all of us who have signed this letter are gay. What a perfect example of just how small-minded you really are.

Through the smoke screen

Union committee member shares insight

JOHN GIESE GUEST

John Giese is an assistant professor of physics.

I have read with great interest the numerous articles and letters in the Collegian concerning the K-State Union's smoking policy.

I served on the Union Smoking Task Force Committee, which considered this policy last spring, as the representative for those with breathing handicaps. As a result, I feel I can offer some informative comments.

The committee did indeed consider the concerns of smokers. The problems with the Union's smoking areas then and in the past were discussed from both smokers' and non-smokers' viewpoints.

One solution that would satisfy both groups would be to provide the smokers with a completely enclosed smoking room. This room would need to be adjacent to an outside wall for proper ventilation.

It was the consensus of the committee that no such room currently exists in the Union. Several places to create such a room were discussed, and as I recall, the Union staff and several committee members estimated the costs of creating such a room.

The committee then made a report to the Union Governing Board, which outlined the various options for a Union smoking policy. Some of these options were leaving things as they were, creating a new smoking area, modifying the existing area and eliminating smoking from the Union. The UGB chose to totally eliminate smoking.

Some of the recent complaints about the Union's smoking policy have been that the UGB and our committee did not give the smokers a fair hearing.

I must admit having doubts about this myself. It seemed to me that many of the members of the committee came to the meetings already having decided to totally eliminate smoking from the Union.

The committee's deliberations were handled rather casually. I have yet to see a copy of the committee's report to the UGB and therefore, cannot verify whether it accurately reflected the consensus of the committee.

The committee members were not notified of the UGB meeting at which the smoking policy was decided. Thus, I do not know on what grounds the UGB made its decision.

I have cystic fibrosis. I can testify that indirect smoke can adversely affect the health of innocent bystanders. Many of the smokers who have complained about the Union's policies seem ignorant of the real physical distress they cause for those around them.

Last year's Union policy of allowing smoking in the hallways and in the recreation center made the Union an unpleasant and somewhat dangerous place for me to be.

Walking through smoke-filled hallways is usually only a minor irritant for me. During severe winter weather, however, entering the Union would sometimes initiate an asthma attack.

I am also a bowler and have participated in the Union leagues for many years. The recreation area had always been smoke-filled.

The Union's policy last year of banning smoking in the Union Stateroom exacerbated this problem. I was finding it increasingly difficult to breathe during our bowling league. As a result of my experiences, I asked to be on the smoking task force committee.

I came to the committee convinced there must be some better smoking policy. I was not, however, committed to totally eliminating smoking from the Union.

I believe a certain amount of tolerance is necessary in a free society. I usually handle my problem with smoke by avoiding smokers. I could not do this last year in the Union.

The Union has the only cafeteria on campus, the only bookstore on campus and is the site for many campus meetings. There was no non-smoking night or non-smoking area in the recreation area. The Union's policy made it difficult for me to use the Union, and I felt strongly this had to change.

Finally, I feel compelled to comment on the "right to smoke."

While the right to choose to smoke is certainly protected by the right of privacy, this does not imply a right to smoke wherever you want. Smoking in public is not protected by our constitution or our laws.

A student paying fees does not gain the right to either smoke in the Union or to ride a bicycle through the Union.

Our society and our student Union, in contrast, do have the right to regulate behavior that is dangerous. There is no doubt smoking is dangerous to both smokers and to at least some of the people around them.

The Union could choose to allow smoking in certain locations because it is wise, tolerant and fair. This is the position I supported last spring in the committee meetings. However, the Union is not obligated to do so.

It must be clear from my comments that my concerns about smoking in the Union have been met by the current policy of totally banning smoking.

I am not absolutely convinced, however, that this is the only policy that would do so. Surely some compromise must be possible.

Monopoly meets Kansas

Sunfloweropoly puts educational twist on game

MELANIE HUNDLEY
Collegian Reporter

Two K-State siblings have teamed together to become educational entrepreneurs of Kansas history.

The brother/sister partnership of Kirsti and Bob Brunsvold from Topeka have developed Sunfloweropoly. The game resembles traditional Monopoly but has an educational twist.

"Part of the reason the game's unique is because it contains Kansas historical facts," said Kirsti Brunsvold, junior in marketing. "People look favorably upon the educational aspect of Sunfloweropoly."

She said the game is played like Monopoly and isn't a Kansas trivia game because players don't have to answer questions. Players learn the planet Pluto was discovered by a Kansan and that our state elected the first woman mayor in the United States. These are examples of state historical facts which appear on the game cards.

The cards containing Kansas historical facts are drawn rather than the original "Community Chest" cards. Kansas Historical Society's museum director, Bob Keckeisen, researched and authored all of the historical fact cards.

Bob Brunsvold, sophomore in marketing, said the "Go" of Monopoly became the Kansas Cosmo-sphere and Space Center's "Start," and instead of just "Go to Jail" Sunfloweropoly players are instructed to "Go to the Dodge City Jail." The original Monopoly's space of "Free Parking" is "Linger Longer in Kansas" on the Sunfloweropoly board. And the "Risk" spaces appropriately picture an ominous Kansas tornado.

The businesses on the game board are either tourist or historical sites, large Kansas-founded companies or companies with corporate offices in Kansas.

This is the Brunsvolds' first "real business" venture, but it isn't their first partnership together. The idea of Sunfloweropoly spawned from a project they did as members of Junior Achievement. The club allows high school students to form their own companies, produce actual products and sell them. The Brunsvolds marketed a Topekaopoly game from 1986 through 1988.

"We decided to take the knowledge we gained in Junior Achievement and actually apply it by starting our own company," said Kirsti Brunsvold. "It isn't the club anymore, it's very much the real world."

The Brunsvolds' company, Kansas Promotional Group, has marketed the game since May. The whole process took about three years from the initial idea to the finished product.

First, Bob Brunsvold said, the pair had to obtain legal written consent from Monopoly-creator Parker Brothers Inc. and a registered trademark through the Secretary of State's office.

Kirsti Brunsvold said they faced many challenges in starting their own company, including finding a printer and financing. After an extensive search, the young entrepreneurs decided upon Graphic Promotions of Topeka, which prints the game and contracts the making of the box and the game pieces to other companies.

The game is supported by businesses' advertising as spaces on the board and sales. Graphic Promotions has also helped in Sunfloweropoly's financing. The Brunsvolds' parents have provided minimal monetary assistance but have contributed other ways, said Kirsti Brunsvold.

Brother and sister Bob and Kirsti Brunsvold, both students in business, worked together to produce the board game Sunfloweropoly. They are currently working on Showmeopoly for the state of Missouri.

"Mom does most of the bookkeeping, and Dad makes contacts for us," she said.

Another concern involves simply establishing a name for their company and the game, said Bob Brunsvold.

"Convincing people it's a quality product and building up trust is important," he said.

The game is currently available for $19.95 at Kansas tourist information centers, Topeka, Kansas City and Wichita Richmond-Gordman stores, School Specialty Supply, some Hallmark stores, Fields of Fair Winery in Paxico, Varney's Bookstore and other specialty stores.

To gain exposure, the pair spent most of last summer traveling throughout the state to promote Sunfloweropoly. In an effort to get the game in the public eye for the upcoming holiday shopping season, they've stepped up advertising on area TV stations. Kirsti Brunsvold said Christmas will be crucial to the company.

"How well the game sells this Christmas will make or break us," she said. "Sales have definitely increased now that Christmas is closer, so we're hopeful."

The enterprising siblings haven't stopped with a game about Kansas. This summer's travels included laying groundwork for Missouri's Showmeopoly, which Kirsti Brunsvold anticipates to be out within a year. Bob Brunsvold has started researching games for Oklahoma, Nebraska, Wisconsin and Minnesota.

Bob Brunsvold said they will market other state games under the name, Brunsvold Promotion — a subsidiary of their company.

The brother-sister team is considering hiring other people to help sell the additional games if they decide to develop them.

As for the company, Kirsti and Bob Brunsvold have different responsibilities. Bob Brunsvold researches suitable stores to sell the game, and Kirsti Brunsvold promotes the game to the potential outlets. She said they've gained insight on how the business world works and how to better cooperate with people, including each other.

"We've gotten to know each other's strengths and weaknesses and can work with that," Kirsti Brunsvold said. "Even though Bob and I still have our moments especially during stressful times, we've gotten a lot closer."

though he is unsure of the exact date. Fulcher also said if mediation is successful and a solution is agreed upon, no further action will be required by the Judicial Board.

"My goal is to clear this up as soon as possible, as it has always been," he said.

If mediation results in a stalemate, however, more formal hearings will be necessary.

A spokeswoman from the Judicial Board office said oral arguments and evidence are presented in addition to the hearings being tape-recorded.

The Judicial Board spokeswoman said she would not allow her name to be used and could not comment on anything because the board is a closed process.

She did say the second-phase hearings could be open if both parties agree upon it.

"This is a different sort of case," she said. "Maybe they'll want it to be open for public inspection."

The final step in the procedure addresses appeals concerning only procedural mistakes.

Giacomozzi said Hennard used two 9mm semiautomatic pistols, with three ammunition clips for each. One, a Ruger P89, carried 15 rounds in each clip. Another, a Glock 17, had 17 rounds.

Police are unsure how many shots were fired, Giacomozzi said. But he added, "The gun was empty on the last round."

He said the guns were bought in February and March, in Henderson, Nev., where Hennard's mother lives, and may have been the only two guns Hennard owned.

Gun control advocates seized on the massacre to try and sway a crucial vote in Washington, where the House was debating a crime bill. But the portion of the bill that would have restricted the high-capacity ammunition clips used in the guns was defeated.

Financial Aid For College

'Slam It' needs overhaul

Chalk this one up as a ho-hummer.

Maybe the word "yawner" might better describe what very few fans witnessed Thursday night in Bramlage Coliseum.

The men's basketball team's yearly practice-opening public scrimmage is an idea whose time is clearly past.

The novelty of the scrimmages, when they started at mid-night, was enough to get a few thousand fans to dot the Bramlage stands.

But no more, and Thursday night's disappointing attendance wasn't the first less-than-impressive turnout in recent years.

Each year, the crowds get smaller and those in attendance become more restless.

How many years in a row can you have a band playing, cheerleaders cheering and folks dashing for cash? At some point, even the most diehard basketball fan reaches his or her limit.

Unfortunately, that point was three years ago.

Instead of unveiling the team each year with a variety of new and exciting events, instead of making the evening a happening, K-State has chosen the more conservative and, yes, boring route.

Maybe that's what Coach Dana Altman wants. If so, why not give him the usual closed-door scrimmage. Get rid of the dog and pony show that this event has become.

After all, the diehard fans will be there when the regular season opens, and the caliber of basketball witnessed in the proceedings isn't enough to sell any additional tickets.

Don't get me wrong, the unit that Altman has assembled for the 1991-92 campaign may be the most talented to play in Manhattan in quite some time.

There are more quality athletes on this team, when looking at the roster from top to bottom, than there were during the 1986-87 season, when Norris Coleman and Mitch Richmond both wore the purple.

But all the talent in the world can't save an event that has obviously run its course.

Should K-State decide to hold such a scrimmage next season, it should make an investment of a few hours tonight and hop in the car to make the trip up I-70 to Lawrence.

There, I'll bet, you'll find 10,000-plus screaming fanatics welcoming the Jayhawks to the floor.

But before they've done so, there will be a Broadway-style review, a skit by the players, a crowd singing in unison, and more celebrities and dignitaries than you can shake a stick at.

Yep, the guys up the river have a way of putting on a pre-season basketball show that has stood the test of time.

Oh, I suppose you could make the argument that the crowd was so low Thursday night because the team finished last in 1990-91.

And that may well be the case here, where the fringe fans often are heard saying "what have you done for me lately?"

Until K-State wins a national championship (the fans wouldn't stay away then, would they?), or until a posse of innovative people take over the planning of this event, it should be scrapped.

It's sad that the school with the most storied basketball tradition in the Big Eight and one of the legendary programs in the history of college basketball can't make an event like this one work.

It did once, and it can again. But not now, and not this way.

Nebraska 1st stop on rough road

Cats to battle Huskers; Buffs, Sooners on deck

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

For the K-State football team, the yearly Bataan Death March has arrived. It's time to travel down Burma Road.

Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma await, and in successive weeks, no less.

First things first. Nebraska provides a test of its own that will be plenty stern on Saturday afternoon at Memorial Stadium in Lincoln, Neb.

And it's the only test with which Coach Bill Snyder and his Wildcats are currently concerned. The fact that three ranked foes are about to be staring the team in the face isn't important.

"I really feel strongly that we're not looking at anyone except Nebraska," Snyder said. "The only word I've heard about Colorado was the fact that the films came in."

That focus — on Nebraska and Nebraska alone — will be vital to the Cats' hopes for success, Snyder said.

The recent effort by the defense in the victory over KU and that displayed during the first half of last year's home loss to the Huskers are big building blocks, Snyder said.

"We have to build a little, No. 1, on last week's ball game with KU," he said. "And you've got to put last year's game with Nebraska right there."

"We're going to have to have the intensity every play that existed in the KU game, obviously."

The first half of the meeting between the two schools in 1990 was more than the Huskers bargained for. It was just 10-2 at halftime, and Nebraska's lone TD of the opening 30 minutes came with just 11 ticks left on the clock in the second period. But Nebraska erupted for 35 second-half points to win 45-8.

That explosiveness has Snyder worried. Coupled with increased diversity on offense by Nebraska, you've got a handful.

"They're a very physical football team, which has normally been the case for Nebraska," Snyder said. "But they're a little more diversified in the running game and have a broader scope passing than they have."

"They're more capable of adjusting to what you put out there. They can run out of the one-back set and throw the ball as well out of their running sets."

That physical nature is also a trademark of the Nebraska defense, Snyder said.

"They don't do an awful lot of things, but they do enough that they can keep you off balance," Snyder said. "They have good speed and quickness in the back side (defensive backfield)."

Snyder said his team will have to execute with a knowledge of Nebraska's strengths and an emphasis on assignments if the Cats are to have success Saturday.

"Obviously, we've got to prevent them from running the football all of the time," Snyder said. "And, as always, Nebraska is very stingy defensively. We can't self-destruct offensively."

Golfers search for right lineup

ERIC BROWN
Sports Writer

The K-State men's golf team will continue their search for a solid unit this weekend as they travel to Ames, Iowa, for the Iowa State Invitational.

It's the fourth tournament for the men, who have yet to settle on a permanent lineup. As a team, K-State has struggled in the first round of each of its meets. Those performances have knocked the Wildcats out of title contention.

"The first round has really hurt us," Coach Mark Elliott said. "We still need a couple people to step up for us."

Junior Richard Laing is the only player who was guaranteed a tournament spot on Thursday as his fourth-place finish at the Falcon Invitational exempted him from the team's qualifying tournament this week.

Laing struggled through most of the fall to regain the form he had this summer when he averaged 71 strokes per round. His average at the start of the fall had climbed to 75. But after the Colorado Springs meet, where he scored 76-74-72 in poor weather, it appears that Laing is back on top of his game.

Fellow junior Jim Brenneman has also been a permanent fixture on the varsity at all of the meets this fall.

"Based on Jim's play, it will take a very bad round for him not to qualify."

Harriers travel west to face quality field

DAVID SVOBODA

For John Capriotti, the homecoming serves a pair of purposes. One of them matters more than the other to his team.

The K-State cross country squads travel to San Luis Obispo, Calif., this weekend for the Cal-Poly Invitational.

The invite marks the return of the Cat coach to his alma mater and allows him the chance to reminisce and renew some old friendships.

It allows his team to show its wares against a field better than any it has faced this year, and that could be big, if either the men's or women's squads fails to earn a berth at nationals via the more traditional district qualifying route.

"We'll see where we stand against teams outside of our own region," Capriotti said. "That's why we're going to this meet."

If K-State should stack up well on either side, one of a possible six at-large berths available for the NCAA meet could come the way of whichever team misses on its chance for automatic qualifying at districts.

Capriotti said that the invite will feature the best teams on the West Coast.

"This is one of the best meets on the West Coast," said Capriotti, who was a part of a national championship team while at Cal-Poly. That team was coached by former K-State athletic director Steve Miller. "Both races have a lot of open runners competing. This should provide great competition."

Capriotti said that his two teams won't back down from what they'll likely face.

Spikers hit Big 8 trail

Colorado comes to Ahearn for weekend match

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

For the K-State volleyball team, the appetizer is over. From now on, the spikers have to bite on the main menu.

And the future could be sweet or bitter.

With a win in their final non-conference match over Drake that improved the Cats' record to 9-12, Coach Patti Hagemeyer's team will shift its focus to Big Eight Conference matches.

The first hurdle for K-State on its way to the Big Eight Tournament is Colorado. The Cats, who are 0-4 in the Big Eight, will be host to the Buffaloes at 7:30 p.m. Saturday in Ahearn Field House.

"Colorado has a tough schedule this year," K-State assistant coach Sue Medley said. "I think they are prepared to play us. Colorado is a strong team and it will be a challenging match, there is no question about that."

Colorado, which finished second last year in the Big Eight, has a record of 15-6. The Buffs, under Coach Brad Saindon, play KU tonight before coming to Manhattan. Colorado has beaten Oklahoma, Iowa State and Missouri twice for a 4-1 league mark.

But like Hagemeyer, who was on a recruiting trip for three days this week, Medley's concern is more about the Cats' game.

"If we play volleyball like we have been playing, I think we have a chance to beat Colorado," she said.

Fatigue shouldn't be a problem when the Cats step on the court Saturday.

"After the hard match against Drake, we gave the team a rest," Medley said. "We had two days off practice because we're playing a very tough schedule next week. Starting with Colorado Saturday, we have four Big Eight matches within a week."

But with two days of practice Thursday and Friday, Medley said the team will be ready to play the Buffs.

K-State will try to duplicate its performance against Drake when Kathy Saxton had a career high of 30 kills and sophomore Wendy Garrett set a school record in assists by breaking the five-year-old mark of 65 in a five-game match. Garrett had 70 assists against the Bulldogs.

Netters to compete at Pepperdine

Four K-State tennis players will participate in the Riviera Women's Championships at Pepperdine University this weekend.

Senior Neili Wilcox, sophomore Michele Riniker and freshmen Karin Lusnic and Marek Plocher will represent the Wildcats in the pre-qualifying rounds of the national tournament. Pre-qualifying brackets will conclude Sunday, with the top eight in each bracket advancing to the qualifying round of 64. The top eight from the qualifying round will advance to the main draw, which will be played Oct. 24-27.

Lusnic and Plocher will team up in doubles competition, and Riniker and Wilcox will form the other team.

"I'm really looking forward to this tournament," K-State tennis coach Steve Bietau said. "This is one of the biggest tournaments in college tennis and it's a great opportunity to represent Kansas State and compete at this level."

Walk-on tryouts slated for Monday

Walk-on tryouts for the K-State men's basketball team will be at 4 p.m. Monday in the Ahearn Gymnasium.

To try out, a student must have full-time status (enrolled in 12 credit hours) and must bring his own equipment.

Soccer team to finish year

Chartrand event to feature Big 8 teams

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

K-State Soccer Club members will lace their shoes for the last time this fall when the team plays at the 13th Annual K-State/Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament in Kansas City, Mo., this weekend.

The first-round games will be played Saturday on the Franke Fields at Lake Jacomo. Semifinals and the championship match are scheduled for Sunday.

K-State coach Viktor Atughonu said he hopes that his team will be one of the final two teams on the field when the championship match starts at 1:30 p.m. Sunday.

"Last year we made the quarterfinals," Atughonu said. "I think, this time, we have a better chance of winning the tournament because we have more people on the team."

For the soccer players, the Ed Chartrand Tournament is the peak of the season because of the high quality of competition. K-State's opponents are KU, Missouri, Oklahoma, Oklahoma State, Iowa State and Nebraska. University of Nebraska-Omaha completes the field of eight teams.

Atughonu said K-State, which enters into the tournament with a season record of 1-2-2, will have its toughest battles with Nebraska and KU, the defending champion.

"We have a good forward line, and our defense is strong, too," Atughonu said. "And with Mike Burgy, we have the best goalkeeper in the tournament."

The only part of the team that might prevent K-State from reaching the finals is its midfield. Atughonu said the transition play between the defense and offense has yet to reach top form.

The tournament is a joint venture of K-State and the Chartrand family to promote soccer at the college level.

It is named after Edward E. Chartrand, a resident of Leawood, who was a soccer player at K-State. Chartrand died in May 1979 at the age of 22.

The K-State soccer team has won the tournament four times. Its last title came in 1989.

Glee clubs to perform at Nebraska game

The men's and women's glee clubs will travel to Nebraska for a dual concert with the Nebraska glee club.

"This is the 25th year the men's glee club has made the trip. It is the first time for the women's," said Gerald Polich, associate professor of music.

Last year, Nebraska came to K-State for the exchange.

"It's somewhat of a competition," said John Hadley, junior in accounting and glee club member. "Last year, we both sang a different version of 'Amazing Grace.' Then we sang a song together."

Saturday, both clubs will attend the K-State-Nebraska football game.

"It's a good way to promote K-State," Hadley said. "We will also sing at various high schools throughout Kansas."

About 70 men and 60 women will make the trip.

Theta Xi chapter wins 3rd national trophy

For the third time in 52 years, the K-State chapter of Theta Xi fraternity has won the Theta Xi Memorial Trophy.

Kevin Sampson, junior in mechanical engineering and Theta Xi secretary, said the trophy goes to the best Theta Xi chapter in the nation.

"The basis of giving the award is from a report filled out by each chapter at the end of the year," Sampson said.

Jim Vredenburg, Theta Xi national executive director, said a committee evaluates the reports, then determines a winner.

"Based on submission and review of the application, points are awarded for each of the areas," Vredenburg said.

"The K-State chapter scored 1,020 points. This is the highest grade any chapter has ever had in this award."

Sampson said although the official awards ceremony was last Saturday, the chapter found out it had won this summer.

Theta Xi fraternity began 127 years ago and has 60 chapters across the United States.

Phony $100 bills on campus

K-State Police, Union victims of fake money; investigation under way

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

Two counterfeit $100 bills have been passed at K-State since registration.

"One bill was taken by the K-State Union, and the other was accepted by the (K-State) Police during fee payment," said Doug Ackley, assistant controller for cashing and student loans.

Campus Police Detective Richard Herrman said he is conducting an investigation to determine from whom the police received the fake bill.

"We have some leads as to who passed it, but these bills could have changed hands many, many times before they were detected," he said.

Local Food 4 Less stores received a memo from their Topeka office last month warning employees about the possibility of receiving counterfeit bills.

"Please be aware of a large amount of counterfeit $10 and $20 bills in the Topeka area. We are quite sure this problem will spread to other towns," Regional Vice President Kent Laughman said in a Sept. 26 memo to Food 4 Less employees.

Laughman listed two serial numbers to watch for on a $10 bill and a $20 bill. The fake bills all seem to have the same serial number in the upper right and lower left corners, Laughman said.

The serial number on the $10 bill is A95720109C, and the serial number on the $20 bill is H70496582B.

"The serial number on each dollar bill is unique to itself. No two real bills will ever have the same number unless one or both are counterfeit," Herrman said.

Bills possessing identical serial numbers are perhaps the most certain way to identify a counterfeit bill. Other means of detection are made more difficult by the large number of counterfeit bill variations in circulation.

A Secret Service agent in Wichita, who asked not to be identified, said there are 15,000 known types of counterfeit money. Each has characteristics that differ from type to type. "Counterfeit bills tend to look like poor copies of an original," he said. "Generally, counterfeit currency just doesn't look as good as real currency."

Neither the Riley County or K-State police departments have been made aware of any other instances of counterfeit bills being passed in the Manhattan area.

"Accepting a counterfeit bill is nothing to be ashamed of," Ackley said. "The $100 bill that they showed me was so good, I would have accepted it if I hadn't known it wasn't real."

New "deterrent features" have been implemented, beginning with the series 1990 $100 bill, to make counterfeiting more difficult, said Roger Guffy, president of the Federal Reserve Bank of Kansas City, Mo.

"The new deterrent features are a polyester strip embedded in the paper and microprinting around the portrait of the note," Guffy said.

Series 1990 bills and those following will include a polyester strip in the bill to the left of the portrait.

New bills will also have microscopic writing which forms a second line around the portrait. The six- to seven-thousandths of an inch-high lettering repeats the words "The United States of America" and can only be read with a magnifying glass.

Freshman to speak on youth in PRIDE

A K-State freshman will deliver the keynote speech during PRIDE day ceremonies Oct. 19 at the K-State Union.

Michelle Munson, freshman in chemical engineering, will speak to representatives of 59 communities on why youth should be included in improvement efforts.

PRIDE is a statewide improvement program, started in 1970, to encourage communities to provide leadership in areas such as water use and recycling, said Stan McAdoo, K-State Extension Service associate specialist in community development and PRIDE day coordinator.

Munson said her speech, "Coming of Age: 21st Year of PRIDE," will focus on the positive aspects youth can bring to community projects.

"I want them to go away with the idea that they can get something accomplished in their communities," Munson said. "I also want them to know that they can use the youth to help them achieve their goals."

A workshop for youth will be given by Munson and Bryndon Meinhardt, freshman in agribusiness. Bryndon said she will speak about her experience working with adults in the community and ways for them to get involved.

Beverly Macy turns the volume up on her TV trying to drown out the screams coming from the four boys in her basement. It doesn't help. Soon she will go to bed, and she will lie awake hoping the noise will stop.

The screams continue, as does the pounding and the screeching. Guitars, music, it sounds like, and it can be heard about two blocks away through the open windows of a blue and white 1978 Dodge van driving up the dirt road toward the house. The van carries a woman—the manager—and a snare drum head covered with seeds and rolling papers.

There are purple-felt-tipped-penned lyrics in an open notebook there in the van. Potato chips are scattered and crunched into the blue shag carpet on the floorboard. The wheels have shaken and shuddered all the way out to the house, but the van makes it. Though you'd not know it now, this van had traveled to Lawrence the week before, carrying the members of Roach Factory to play on an outdoor stage near Lawrence where several hundred fans shivered and slammed in the cold to the same sounds coming from under Beverly Macy's house.

Which reminds the manager of the time when the van blew a tire in Oklahoma, leaving her and the band stranded in the mythical middle of nowhere. A woman, a chick, stopped to give the band food and a ride to a gas station.

You learn a lot on the road, Brian McCallum, the screamer, says after stopping practice in Beverly Macy's dark basement. It's educational.

"You call your folks every few days to let them know you're alive," he says, "but other than that you're alone except for each other. There's no way you could do that unless you were in a band like this."

This band, this Roach Factory, is the four boys' thing, their creation. Together, they are alone.

"We're the bad guys, man," McCallum says with a mouthful of popcorn. "People talk more shit about us."

Like the rumor that they're all having sex with each other. Or the one where they're always doped up. Or, more better, that they've been signed by Elektra or Asylum or whatever the label of the moment is.

But they are not having sex with each other. They are not always doped up. They have not been signed. Yet.

Roach Factory is currently wading through the crap called the music biz, McCallum says. And in the meantime, he and Beverly's guitarist son, Derek Macy, and guitarist Lincoln Linder are going to school pursuing degrees. The drummer, Erik Conn, says he is between classes.

Three of them are fry cooks at restaurants here in town. One works in a bookstore.

"It's totally frustrating because in our heads we know we can get better and we've got that drive," Conn says. "We're writing good songs, we're confident about our music, we're confident in each other, but we're not doing it. We're getting up each morning and flipping burgers."

Frustration. You can feel it around them, when they play, especially. It's in their grunging guitars, their fren-as possible and as many as necessary."

tic, tribal drums, their scraunching, distorted vocals and their songs. They write about frustration a lot, Conn says.

"Frustration," Conn says, "is art. This — what we do — is totally art. That's how Brian puts it a lot of times and that's, y'know, right on the money."

McCallum does put it like that. He says Roach Factory has a groove, it has soul, and the other band members nod in agreement. Roach Factory is possessed by "that feeling" that they all try to describe at once.

"There are times when we're playing live," McCallum says. "and we sit back and just listen. It's like a big machine that you're riding on top of.

Conn says. "You put it out and the crowd receives it and they get all amped and you see they're amped and you get all amped and the energy just goes around and around and around —"

"—and you took out," McCallum says, "and there's people flying up against the stage and they hit their head on the stage at your feet and they go, 'ohh' and you're, like, 'Wow, I did that.'"

Those are the good times, the big gigs. They have played to no one. "Like that Fort Riley gig," McCallum says. "There were, like, five people there, and we totally rocked out. Then there's, like, two people out there yelling 'Freebird' and 'Whipping Post.'"

It's kind of weird, Derek Macy says.

"People come to see us," he says, "and I go to see the people. Only we get paid for it."

There's a laugh. "Sometimes we get paid," Linder says, tweaking the strings of the guitar across his lap.

The members of Roach Factory wonder where they're going. When the five of them are together, the four musicians and their manager, Carrie Miller, they talk about the gig next week in Topeka and the gig last week in Manhattan, what a fusterclock that was, and the possibility of playing the Bottleneck in Lawrence.

"We've played everywhere there is to play in Kansas except for the Bottleneck in Lawrence," McCallum says. "We can't get in there. It has a lot of red tape, and it has a lot to do with us being Manhattan dudes."

But it's not that big of a deal, they say. They'd like to travel more places, though, but when you're unknowns and nobody knows just who the hell you are, it's hard to get in anywhere. And when you do get in somewhere, no one shows up.

"When we were trying to travel it was a real pain in the ass," McCallum says. "Carrie probably burned up more money in phone bills than we actually made. You're kind of just out there. It's kind of like a free vacation if you don't mind eating a lot of baloney."

And if you don't mind being out there, all alone, with your music and your instruments and your amps and each other and a van that shakes more and more the faster it goes.

There are no secrets to this band, they all say. They are just four dudes who know they can do better than they are doing if only someone would give them a chance.

"It's so hard to be in Manhattan, Kansas," Conn says. "In the middle-of-the-United-States-nowhere-small town just shuckin' and jivin'. Being so totally inspired and so full of ambition and drive."

They are back in the basement now, getting ready to practice, again. Beverly Macy has drifted off to sleep, which she manages to do once in a while, her son says.

"That's a major achievement on her part," Derek Macy says, picking up his bass. "But sometimes I go to sleep when we practice."

Derek Macy sits while he plays the bass now. His foot hurts.

"Derek burned his foot last night," McCallum says. "I called him up at two in the morning and asked him, 'How's your foot?'"

But that's how Roach Factory is. "We go out and get drunk together," McCallum says, to the laughter of his bandmates. "We're friends, man, we're not like a band. There's a lot of people who don't like us but it's like, how's that quote go?"

"We try to offend as few people as possible —" Conn says, interrupted. "— and as many as necessary," Derek Macy finishes.

Linder cranks up his guitar, pulls the ponytail holder out of his long, blond hair and plays. The others follow suit. And McCallum screams into the microphone. Upstairs, Beverly Macy wakes up, turns off the TV and goes to bed. She will lie awake for awhile, but eventually she'll sleep because she knows Roach Factory won't be practicing in her basement too much longer.

Slowhand goes back in time

'24 Nights' sounds like Eric's days with the Dominoes

ERIN PERRY
A&E Contributing Writer

Listening to Eric Clapton's latest live work may make you think he took a vacation between Derek and the Dominoes in the early 1970s and last year's "Journeyman."

That's not necessarily a bad thing, but it makes you wonder if there's a lost disc somewhere.

Clapton plays with four different band configurations on "24 Nights," a 15-song double album recorded during an extended gig at London's Royal Albert Hall early this year.

The project was begun during his 1990 stint at the Albert Hall, an annual event. But, ever the perfectionist, Clapton scrapped those recordings and started the project over.

Hard-core fans surely would have been pleased with either set, but Clapton's his own harshest critic.

Good thing his playing isn't that retentive.

Slowhand seems looser than ever and holds nothing back, especially on the first disc's smoky blues numbers. The bump and grind of "Hoodoo Man" is particularly nasty, featuring the mind-numbing mixture of Jimmie Vaughan, Robert Cray and Clapton's idol, Buddy Guy.

Three Cream classics and a "Journeyman" selection round out the first disc, played by a stripped-down, four-piece set.

"Worried Life Blues" and the obligatory "Wonderful Tonight" are the only hints at the middle portion of Clapton's career.

Another noticeable omission is the gut-wrenching "Layla." Most of Derek and the Dominoes' only studio album, "Layla and Other Assorted Love Songs," is Clapton's musical plea for love to George Harrison's wife, Patti.

In a recent Rolling Stone interview, Clapton seemed surprised the song wasn't on this album — or any of his live works — though it remains in his concert repertoire. Guess it's lost a little of its previously intense meaning.

MUSIC REVIEW

24 NIGHTS

Eric Clapton

"24 Nights" is not the place to go looking for "Cocaine" or "Lay Down Sally," as Clapton seems to be returning to his first love — the blues.

GRADE

B-

The second disc contains the most traditional and the most innovative work in the set.

It opens with Clapton's regular, nine-piece touring band on his last singles, "Pretending" and "Bad Love." Next is a slower piece he wrote with Cray, "Old Love," also from "Journeyman." This collaboration packs a lot more power than the studio version.

The requisite mid-song solo opens with an aching, bent-note guitar wail and later rolls into some cool jazz keyboard work. It's a soulful improvement from the sometimes-bland original.

The last three songs seem to be an odd marriage of styles — Clapton and his band with the National Philharmonic Orchestra. But what could have been bloated and heavy-handed came out stunning.

"Bell Bottom Blues," a sister song to "Layla," merges Clapton's blues guitar with the right amount of strings to enhance its soul. Give his back-up singers credit for blending the harmonies, not drowning out everything else as some tend to do live.

"24 Nights" isn't the place to go looking for "Cocaine" or "Lay Down Sally," as Clapton seems to be returning to his first love — the blues. Fans of the blues won't mind.

Aggieville to lose Earth Store

Lack of interest, environmental fad lead to closing

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

The Earth Store in Aggieville is closing because the owners say there isn't enough environmental interest in Manhattan.

Mitchell Leggs, co-owner of the store, said public reception was great at first, but the enthusiasm didn't convert into sales.

"When it first opened, people thought it was a really great idea, somewhat like a novelty," he said. "It's like going to a concert just to get the T-shirt because you think it's cool. But it doesn't mean you buy the records."

The Earth Store sells basic products such as recycled paper and envelopes, as well as statement-making political items, such as shirts and posters.

Laurel Nichols owns and operates the store with Mitchell. She said the closing was due to a combination of a misconception about environmentalism and the small size of Manhattan.

"Lots of people treat environmentalism as a fad," Nichols said. "It is still very much in a transitional period. And even though there are many dedicated people, the general public still needs to be educated."

Lack of education often leads students to make purchases that may not benefit the environment, she said.

"Students buy 'recycled' goods at Wal-Mart, and it makes them feel like they are doing their part," she said. "What they don't realize is that the product may only contain 10 percent recycled material, be wrapped in plastic and printed with toxic inks."

Jayne Link, owner of People's Grocery Co-op, said the organization of the Manhattan community contributes to the problem.

"It is tough for any kind of alternative business to make it here," she said. "Being connected with a college and a military base, people don't always find the time to go out of their way to find alternative shopping."

Another reason students may not have purchased the quantity the owners had expected is the higher cost of environmentally safe products. Even though the cost may exceed that of other products, the owners said the store did beat most prices in recycled product catalogs.

Nichols said they have no plans to sell off the store because of the hesitation of others to buy a business that has yet to make a profit.

'M. Butterfly' criticizes racism

Sexual stereotypes are topic of play

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

Racial and Ethnic Harmony Week continued Tuesday night through the performance of David Henry Hwang's "M. Butterfly."

REVIEW

The play, set in middle to late 20th-century China, criticizes the negative stereotype of the Asian culture through the symbolism of the opera, "Madame Butterfly." It also expanded its scope to include misconceptions between East and West cultures, men and women and sexual orientation.

Graeme Malcolm turned in a strong performance as French diplomat Rene Gallimard. Gallimard falls in love with what he thinks is the ideal woman, Chinese opera singer Song Liling, played by Francis Jue.

Song Liling is actually a male actor and spy who gains information from Gallimard during their 20-year affair.

Jue, judging from applause at the end of the performance, was the crowd favorite. He was breathtakingly convincing as a petite opera star and as a manipulating imposter.

In an interview with the Kansas City Star last week, Jue said he spent a great deal of preparation time studying women, feminine mannerisms and expectations. It was evident.

Hwang's delicate balance of sensitive issues and comedy makes the plot comfortably accessible. An example is found in Renee, lightheartedly presented by Lyn Wright. Renee is a young, one-night stand for Gallimard — his "extra, extra-marital affair."

Renee delighted the audience with her philosophy that world power is directly influenced by penis size. Men with small penises, or "weenies" as she called

Senate

Many senators asked questions about how other groups will be funded, such as SGA, College Republicans and Amnesty International, since they could be interpreted as being partisan.

Senate Chairman Pete Marsh said the recommendation is not something that was going to be voted on Thursday night.

"This is nothing we'll vote on tonight or probably not while we're in office," he said. "Let's not 'what if' this to death tonight."

The committee also recommended to revise the SGA Constitution so that students who choose not to be members of SGA may disassociate themselves with the organization.

As it exists, all K-State students are members of SGA. Hence, when SGA funds a group, students are automatically associated with it.

Raborn said the revision would appeal to students who do not agree with the views of all the groups funded by SGA.

"If they don't want to be a part of the entire system. They don't have to," he said. "Only a fairly small number of students will do this anyway."

Students who choose to disassociate themselves with SGA will not be allowed to vote in SGA elections or run for office, according to the revision recommendation.

After the recommendation was discussed, a bill to increase the number of polling locations was debated.

Brad Marshall, engineering senator, said he sponsored the bill to achieve a more representative voice of the student body by having locations at the Union, Cardwell Hall, Bluemont Hall and the Veterinary Medicine Center.

"They don't make everyone go to downtown Kansas City to vote. They have precincts to be more accessible," he said.

The bill was rejected and senators opposed to the bill said students will come to one location to vote if they are concerned.

"We don't need to cater to people who don't care," Gruenke said.

'Shattered' full of suspensePlot problems overcome by acting, action and mystery

JENNIFER BEALS
A&E Writer

Things aren't always what they seem.

Quick on the heels of "Dead Again" is Wolfgang Petersen's "Shattered." Not only do these film have similar storylines, but also share a twisted, bizarre plot.

REVIEW

In "Shattered," Tom Berenger recovers from a terrible car accident only to find he has amnesia. Supported by his doting wife (Greta Scacchi), he picks up the pieces to re-enter the mainstream of life. Everything is perfect, until he finally begins to regain his memory.

Bob Hoskins also co-stars as a private investigator who aids Berenger in his search for identity.

The plot of "Shattered" is filled with mystery and suspense. Throughout the film, Petersen drops many innuendoes to get the mind going. He links many conversations with visual clues to help the audience pick up on the ending. The mystery entailed in "Shattered" is one of whodunit. Throughout the movie, one might think the neighbor did it or the boss did it, but no one knows for sure, unless Sherlock views this one.

The only unattractive aspect to the plot is believability. As the story unfolds, the plot begins its usual twists and turns. The only thing wrong is that it goes too far. Towards the end, the movie is tainted by an overactive and unbelievable plot that is really hard to digest.

A redeeming quality of "Shattered" is the acting. Both Berenger ■ See SHATTER, Page 14

'Scarlett' lacks imaginationRipley's characters pale in shadow of Mitchell's classic Southern saga

LISA EDMUNDS
A&E Writer

"The times they are a-changin'," wrote Bob Dylan, prolific prophet of rock 'n' roll.

At times during the 800-page plus saga that is "Scarlett," I couldn't help but wish that maybe Dylan or Danielle Steele or Judith Krantz had tackled the task of producing the sequel to "Gone With the Wind."

Alexandra Ripley, author of a number of adequate Southern novels, however, is the author of "Scarlett," released earlier this month.

Ripley has produced a number of perfectly nice books and is a decent writer, but as a whole, she lacks the imagination and depth of Margaret Mitchell, and Mitchell's characters suffer for it in the sequel.

I think what offends me the most about this book is that Ripley removes Scarlett from the south and takes her instead to Ireland. It's a perfectly wonderful place and a beautiful setting for a novel, but it is just no place for Scarlett O'Hara.

Or, make that Scarlett O'Hara Hamilton Kennedy Butler. That Scarlett — the wild, exciting, colorful, energetic girl of Mitchell's novel — is nowhere to be found in Ripley's sequel.

Even the most dedicated fans of the Mitchell novel expected Scarlett to grow and mature, but Ripley draws a character that is far too modern for dedicated followers of the "GWTW" fantasy.

The new Scarlett has been abandoned by Rhett, but it does not take up at the end of "GWTW," where Scarlett declares she will "think about that tomorrow." We instead begin 10 years later at the funeral of Melanie Hamilton Wilkes.

Die-hard fans expect the novel to pick up the Ashley/Scarlett romance right at the start, knowing full well that the old Scarlett would have killed to get her hands on Ashley, but, Ripley's Scarlett has little but pity for the once-dashing Mr. Wilkes.

Scarlett realizes it is Rhett she really loves and spends the rest of the novel trying to get him back. She goes to Charleston, then to Savannah, playing an intricate game of hide and seek with her husband. And, eventually, she does lose him.

But not before they have one last romantic encounter, leaving Scarlett to have Rhett's child as a last-ditch effort to keep him.

Scarlett, as "GWTW" readers, but not movie fans, will remember, already has two children. But this child is "different." She really loves this baby because it is her last link to Rhett.

At that point, Ripley conforms to standard romance novel form and really loses the life of the story. Scarlett turns into a model mother and produces a perfect child whom she raises all alone in this big castle in Ireland.

She even gets involved in Irish politics, as her O'Hara cousins are solid members of the revolution, while running the hunt with the English landowners.

There are complications, but overall, most of "Scarlett" is just plain dull. It may tug at the heartstrings a little, and you may even be able to finish the whole thing — it took quite an effort — but it pales in comparison to the original.

son to the original.

The original novel offered a beautiful, well-rounded portrait of an important time in the history of the nation, and the story was filled with lots of vivid and exciting characters. "Gone With the Wind" was a story about the South as it was and a tribute to a way of life that had slipped away.

"Scarlett" is filled with modern psycho-babble and lukewarm characters, and it serves more as an embarrassment than a tribute or sequel.

Mitchell must be turning in her grave — and with good reason.

Forget "Scarlett" and the eventual movie. Go back to read "GWTW," or at least check in with Clark Gable and Vivian Leigh just one more time. It will be time well spent.

God■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 9

Personal tragedies are another human quality in Clapton. The death of Stevie Ray Vaughan definitely had an impact on his emotions, even though he doesn't remember what city he played the night after the incident (Kansas City for those of you keeping score at home). "God" is forgetful.

Also, last spring his four-year-old son Connor fell from a window 10 stories high. Why would "God" allow such pain into his own life?

If "God" is ageless, then why is most of his living competition running circles around him? Jeff Beck, Steve Winwood and the Rolling Stones just keep pumping out quality music and ol' "God" just re-files his old stuff. Even "Journeyman" had some re-makes on it.

With all this in mind, I still get a big thrill out of Clapton when he does some improvisational work. His small appearance on "Little Red Rooster" from the Rolling Stones' "Flashpoint" sent chills through me. It's by far his best work since the mid-1970s.

I never knew a god could be so inconsistent.

I guess he's just human.

Rape

acquiring more accurate rape statistics for K-State.

Students who had been sexually assaulted, but didn't want to go to the police, could go to their living group staff, faculty adviser or counselor. Those people in turn would fill out the report and turn it in to the Dean of Student Life office.

Just three rapes were reported. Scott said the feedback was low because of a lack of publicity. Not many students were aware of the system, she said.

The statistics acquired from the reports are not accurate, Scott said. She said, however, she thinks the numbers are still probably low.

"We have a relatively safe campus, and I'm not saying that to hide anything. The problem is that sexual assaults are happening to K-State students, whether or not it happened on campus," she said. "If a woman reports it to the RCPD, those information sheets are right there to look at. There's no cover up by the campus police."

One way to look at a statistic is to think that for every reported rape, there are 10 that go unreported, said Sandra Coyner, director of Women's Studies. This number is used by the FBI in compiling their statistics, she said.

A study done by Mary Koss, a psychologist at Kent State University, showed that by the age of 18, 25 percent of the women and 10 percent of the men in the United States have been sexually assaulted, Coyner said.

There are a number of reasons why sexual assault victims don't report it, Beckom said. One factor is feelings of guilt the victim may feel.

"Rape has a strong mental impact on the victim. The victim may feel some guilt in the process. They may ask 'What did I do?' or 'What indications did I provide?' It comes from years of inappropriate teachings in our society," he said.

A rape victim may also find it hard to report the crime if he or she knows it will lead to court, Beckom said. The fact that the United States judicial system is set up to protect the accused can scare victims from going through with the legal process.

"Everything the victim has ever done will be questioned," he said. "Our way of protecting the criminal allows the accused to plead innocent. The victim goes through mental anguish and may be publicly scrutinized."

Beckom said under the Fifth Amendment to the Constitution, the accused has the right to remain silent.

It is the victim who has the burden of proof.

"If you look at any recent case, in regards to rape, the victim is the only person they can get information on. They have no rights," he said.

John Robertson, psychologist at University Counseling Services, said he agreed there were many reasons someone hurting would not report a rape, even if it happened 10 years ago.

"It's a real risk for them to announce it to the world, because who knows what will happen as an end result," Robertson said. "If put in the jail, the criminal will one day be let out."

The media also plays a part in inhibiting victims from reporting rape, he said.

"Creating visibility for a victim intensifies the trauma," Robertson said.

Scott said the best defense against rape is to let people understand it can happen to anyone.

"I'm hopeful that the time will come when both men and women will say this is not right, this is not cool," she said.

"We should be among the better teams at the meet," he said. "I expect us to do well."

K-State has done just that in the previous two meets, as Wildcat individuals and teams have scored well at the Wichita State and Loyola-Lakefront invites.

Both teams are currently ranked in national polls as well.

K-State's women enter the meet at 14th in the NCAA Coaches Poll. The Cats are the highest-ranked Big Eight team in the women's division of the poll.

On the men's side, the team is ranked 26th after opening the year among the nation's more highly touted squads.

Capriotti said the events of the weekend should be good preparation for the upcoming Big Eight and District V meets.

"We're looking forward to the competition and know that it's getting close to crunch time," he said.

ify," graduate assistant coach Len Johnsen said.

The third spot on down has proven to be a revolving door for the Wildcat golfers.

Seniors Bill Graham and Brett Vuillemin, expected to be stable third and fourth players, have struggled through the season.

Elliott has had a few pleasant surprises, however, as sophomore David Sedlock has emerged as a capable Big Eight golfer. Freshman Brett Waldman has also shown potential in his two performances.

Sophomores Will Seibert, Chadd Judd and Sean Robertson have all played well in tournaments, also.

The teams that the Cats will compete against this weekend are Iowa State, Creighton, Drake, Emporia State and Augustana. Two teams that were undetermined as of Thursday may also compete.

The tournament will tee off Sunday morning at Iowa State and is scheduled for two rounds.

shootings emphasized a need to prohibit possession of weapons and clips designed to "spray" bullets.

"I don't need an assault weapon to go out there and kill a deer," said Rep. John Bryant, D-Texas. "The fact of the matter is that nobody needs an assault weapon except cowards and criminals and weirdos who have to own an assault weapon in order to feel like a man."

The White House expressed sympathy for the victims in Texas but said President Bush was not changing his stance on gun controls.

"You can't legislate behavior," said Judy Smith, a deputy White House press secretary.

Gun control advocate Sarah Brady, whose husband James was critically wounded in an assassination attempt in 1981 on former President Reagan, expressed bitterness over the vote on an amendment backed by the National Rifle Association.

"This is totally irresponsible to the American public's safety," she said. "It's just one more reason to be utterly disgusted with the U.S. Congress."

The author of the proposed prohibitions, covering sale or possession of 13 models of assault-type semiautomatic weapons as well as ammunition clips with more than seven rounds, acknowledged before the vote that he faced an "uphill battle."

"The tragedy yesterday added some momentum in our direction, but at this point I don't think it is enough," said Rep. Charles Schumer, D-N.Y.

It was enough for Edwards, whose district includes Killeen, site of Wednesday's deadliest mass shooting in the nation's history.

"It takes away from being an issue of statistics, numbers, charts and legal issues," he said. "For me, the old arguments ring hollow."

them, feel the need to prove themselves as men, so they build large buildings or conquer large nations.

Hwang also broke tension with the interaction between characters and the audience. Gallimard's monologues were nearly dialogues with the audience.

Another unseemly highlight was the performance of the Peking Opera, in which Song Liling performs. The acrobatics of the players drew oohs and ahhs from the crowd.

As a whole, M. Butterfly held together consistently as a variety of stories — love, mystery, tragedy and moral.

and Hoskins give this film a dose of credibility when the film falls short.

Berenger is not only a terrific actor, but appeals to the audience as an underdog. Hoskins is a delightful surprise as the bumbling private eye. He not only can make the most of an unlikely situation, but adds his own brand of humor. Scacchi portrays the role of the black widow perfectly. She not only proves to be cunning and calculating, but gives a new meaning to the word promiscuous. This woman should receive credit for going to so much trouble just to cover her tracks.

All in all, "Shattered" provides a suspenseful evening of entertainment. By overlooking its flaws, this movie has strong acting, great action and a fine mystery all wrapped up in a neat, little package.

Local food bank fights hunger

SHANE KEYSER/Staff

Atina Hanna, director of The Flint Hills Breadbasket, stands among the empty shelves of their storage building. The shelves serve as a constant reminder of the needy people and families in the Manhattan area, Hanna said. The organization was formed in 1982.

Flint Hills Breadbasket provides aid to more than 2,000 area residents

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

Nearly 35,000 people throughout the world die of hunger and other related diseases each day. Some of them are part of this community.

Hunger and poverty exist in Manhattan, and the Flint Hills Breadbasket comes to the aid of the needy.

The Breadbasket is a food bank that collects and distributes food throughout the year.

In 1982, the Breadbasket opened its doors, working out of a small former paint shop owned by the city. It strived to promote its cause and gain supporters.

The organization was granted a larger building in 1987. K-State sororities and fraternities helped weatherproof the building.

The organization is based on a waste-not, want-not philosophy. With the help of community volunteers, it gathers and distributes food to those in need — goods that may otherwise be wasted.

The Breadbasket's formal objective is "to minimize hunger and poverty at the local level through the distribution of available food, and to nurture projects that will help alleviate hunger and poverty."

Members of the organization conduct many programs during the year to meet this goal.

"Our goal is not only to feed mouths but to get these people back on their feet," Executive Director Atina Hanna said.

The Temporary Emergency Food Program (TEFAP) provides USDA commodities, when available, to over 800 families and 2,000 people in Riley County and surrounding areas.

The Breadbasket also conducts an emergency food pantry service from 9 a.m. to 1 p.m. Saturdays.

Traditional events include the annual Thanksgiving dinner at Manhattan Middle School and the Mayor's Holiday Tree.

The Mayor's Holiday Tree, the Breadbasket's biggest event, is a holiday food drive to provide baskets of food for the hungry.

Manhattan merchants, religious groups and University students join forces in the drive. A tree-lighting ceremony takes place in early December to begin the giving season.

"This event is very special,"

Hanna said. "The mayor uses his heart and his umbrella to collect food so no one goes hungry."

Community and education are the keys to making the Breadbasket work and making hunger disappear.

"My vision is of community development," Hanna said. "It's important that we educate the people in the community and work together to make it better."

Hanna said it is also important to educate children, not only because they are most at risk, but because they are the future.

"Someday, I'd like to see the Breadbasket closed and not have hunger problems anymore," Hanna said. "It's sad the Breadbasket is even needed, and I hope someday it won't be."

Hunger is on the rise across the country due to an increase in poverty and the recent recession.

Dan Dehner, Breadbasket food programs coordinator, said although hunger is a global issue, statistics are humanized at Breadbasket.

"It's hard to believe there are so many hungry people in Manhattan. You hear about it in big cities or see it on television, but you never think about it in this town," he said.

Dehner said it's easy to detect poverty and hunger in big cities because there are such drastic differences in social classes, but in a smaller town they aren't so noticeable.

"Their children go to the same schools as ours do," he said.

The annual events conducted by the Breadbasket are its biggest source of food to give away, but it can be hard to keep the shelves full enough to provide for everyone in need.

"We operate like an hourglass," Hanna said. "We like to see the food come in but go right back out to the families who need it. But there isn't enough, it's hard."

Dehner said, "The hardest thing to do is turn people away. A mother and three children came in the other day, and I had to turn her away because she wasn't in our jurisdiction."

Although it moves his heart to see these people each day, he said, it's also rewarding to help someone whose life improves because of the Breadbasket's help.

"I never feel worthless working here. The constant need for us to be here always overcomes the worst problems."

Snyder said another thing might contribute to a possible lack of success Saturday — the fact that the team is coming off of a very emotional and very important win.

"We're very concerned about the fact that we're coming off of an emotional win over Kansas," he said. "And perhaps even more so than the fact that we're about to play Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma."

Middle East shows signs of hope, peace

Israel decides to attend Middle East peace conference

By the Associated Press

JERUSALEM — Most members of Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir's Cabinet set aside misgivings on Sunday and voted for Israel to attend next week's Middle East peace conference.

One of Shamir's allies in the government, the ultra-right Tehiyah party, balked and said it would leave the coalition when the peace talks begin on Oct. 30 in Madrid, Spain. Shamir's Likud party was not in danger of losing power, however.

An Arab group that opposes the talks bombed an Israeli convoy in southern Lebanon, killing three soldiers and wounding two. The bombing raised fears of terrorism by extremists opposing Arab negotiations with Israel.

The pro-Iranian Hezbollah, or Party of God, claimed responsibility and reportedly linked it to the conference.

The Cabinet vote was the last step needed for Israel to send representatives to the U.S.-Soviet-sponsored talks. However, the Cabinet set a condition: that Israel's positions regarding the Palestinian negotiators be met.

Israel has said it will not negotiate with representatives of the Palestine Liberation Organization, known PLO members, Palestinian exiles or residents of Arab east Jerusalem. It says it will leave the peace conference if the Palestinian negotiators profess ties to the PLO, which Israel calls a terrorist organization.

The Palestinians will attend as members of a joint delegation with Jordan.

PLO chairman Yasser Arafat arrived in Amman, Jordan, Sunday to meet with King Hussein.

PLO officials said Arafat and Hussein would discuss the makeup and workings of the joint delegation. Arafat will push for a meeting of the PLO and front-line Arab states to discuss the conference.

"The PLO is trying to secure an Arab commitment that no Arab state will normalize relations with Israel before the Palestinian problem is properly addressed and resolved," said Abdurahim Mallouh, a member of the PLO. Although Israel has not been shown a list of Palestinian delegates, both Shamir and Foreign Minister David Levy said Friday they believed assurances by U.S. Secretary of State James Baker that the list would meet Israel's demands.

Israel television quoted Hezbollah, which claimed responsibility for Sunday's attack on the Israeli soldiers,

U.S. hostage expected to be released Monday

By the Associated Press

BEIRUT, Lebanon - Shiite Muslim kidnappers are expected to release an American hostage by Monday afternoon, the United Nations said Sunday. Israel is to free some Arab prisoners in response.

The announcement from the U.N. information center in Beirut did not say which of the five American captives in Lebanon would be freed or where. U.N. officials refused to elaborate on the brief statement.

The U.N. announcement came after Israel said Saturday it had received solid information that one of its five missing servicemen in Lebanon was dead and hinted it would free more of its Arab prisoners.

The hostage holders are demanding that Israel free all Arab prisoners in exchange for the release of all hostages, but Israel has said it first must know the status of its missing servicemen.

Of the nine remaining hostages, the one held longest is American Terry Anderson, chief Middle East correspondent for the Associated Press. He was kidnapped March 16, 1985.

The other American hostages are Thomas Sutherland, acting dean of agriculture at American University of Beirut; Joseph Cicippio, acting university comptroller; Alann Steen, Parents question security

Residence hall safety improving; University takes steps to protect students

MELLISSA PETERS
Collegian Reporter

Potential students and their parents, more and more, are asking about the safety of residence halls.

"This is becoming a very important issue for us because it is becoming much more important for students and parents," said Rosanne Proite, assistant housing director.

"Security was a main concern for my parents," said Jennifer Walters, freshman in pre-law. "I wasn't so worried about it, but I did think about it."

Proite said there are a number of different ways the University ensures security for residents. The campus police are the most important element.

"The campus police are an integral part of security on this campus," Proite said. "Students need to report crimes to the police."

K-State Police Chief Charles Beckom said the department is only as good as the public makes it.

"The public needs to communicate with us," Beckom said.

Residence hall staffs also promote and ensure security, Proite said.

A full-time staff member lives in each building. There are also student staff members, often referred to as RAs and SAs, Proite said.

Proite said that in addition to the staff and student staff members, there are also receptionists on duty in the halls 24 hours a day. No matter what time it is, there is always someone awake and alert, she said.

The third and newest feature in Residence hall security

There are three feature security systems for students living in the residence halls.

■ K-State Police — Regularly patrol areas around residence halls and their parking lots.

■ Residence hall staff and receptionists — There are staff members and receptionists on duty 24 hours a day in each hall.

■ Validine Access System — Allows only residents to enter the halls after late hours.

residence hall security is the Validine Access System, Proite said. The system was installed last year in all halls except Edwards, Goodnow and Marlatt. It will be installed in those three halls sometime this year.

The system is designed to provide access only to residents of that building after a certain hour of the day, Proite said.

For example, a resident of Ford Hall would take her student ID and run it through an electric reader at Ford to obtain access to the building.

Each building has its own access reader, Proite said. A resident of Ford cannot use her ID to obtain access to Boyd.

There is also a telephone located at the front of the hall, so visitors can call their host and be admitted to the Housing starts Evans project

Repairs begun because of protests, say current residents

RUSSELL HENKE
Collegian Reporter

Evans residents and the Department of Housing and Dining Services hope some minor renovations and better communication will upgrade Evans residents' living conditions to levels comparable to that of other University housing.

The 20 Evans Apartments, 1429 Laramie St., typically house non-married graduate students.

"I'd be the first one to admit that housing had been neglecting Evans Apartments," said Chuck Werring, director of housing and dining services.

The renovations consist primarily of painting, furniture repair and electrical repair affecting the kitchens and bathrooms in particular.

The bathroom of B. Rangaraj, graduate in mechanical engineering, revealed peeling paint and tiles adhered to the wall by tape.

Gene Wiley, maintenance superintendent for housing, said renovation costs will range from $1,000 to $2,000 per apartment. Wiley said the renovations began about a month ago and estimated their completion will take three months.

Some residents said the renovations are in response to their complaints about a 15-percent rent increase implemented this July. Rent for a one-bedroom apartment increased from $200 to $230 per month.

"The renovations came up only after we protested twice against the raise," said Kulvinder Gill, research associate in plant pathology.

Susanne Tunstall, administration officer for housing, said the rent increase was approved in January in order to run the utilities and maintain routine repairs.

Gill said money spent by housing for the apartment renovations should concentrate on needed improvements, especially the extermination of roaches.

"The main thing is that the roaches should be eliminated," he said.

"They should spend money on things that are needed rather than changing the door knob which wasn't

Fire burns Konza Prairie

Cause of blaze unknown; about 1,600 acres scorched

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

About 1,600 acres of Konza Prairie Research Natural Area burned Sunday evening due to "sheer stupidity," said Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish.

"As dry as it is, it's just stupid to burn," Deppish said.

Pat Collins, Riley County assistant fire chief, said the cause of the fire is unknown. He said he is not yet calling the fire arson, but it was caused by someone on the prairie.

"The fire didn't start from anything thrown from the highway," he said.

The fire started near I-70 and Frontage Road in Geary County. Wind and extremely dry conditions allowed the fire to quickly spread into Riley County.

It took firefighters from Wabaunsee, Geary and Riley counties more than four hours to extinguish the blaze.

"We left trees still burning," Collins said Sunday night. "But the people from Konza are watching it through the night."

Riley County currently has a ban on burning due to dry conditions, said

"It's gunpowder-dry out there," Hauck said.

Deppish said Geary County will also initiate a ban on burning.

Homemakers gear up for conference

The Kansas Extension Homemakers Council is gearing up for its annual conference Oct. 22-24 at the Ramada Inn in Topeka.

Speakers, workshops, tours and a cultural arts exhibit are scheduled.

Trolley and walking tours of Topeka's historical sights will be given throughout the conference. Sights will include the Statehouse, the Museum of History and Gov. Joan Finney's official residence.

Workshop topics include textile and clothing, international literacy and safety. There will also be a special workshop for extension homemakers 35 years old or younger dealing with educational programs, childcare and safety.

"Anyone is welcome to attend the conference, including K-State students. The first day will include organizations' office training for extension homemakers, so this would be a good learning experience," Emily Mark, extension home economist said.

Keynote speakers will be state Rep. Joan Wagon of Topeka, executive director for the Topeka YWCA, who will discuss "The Changing Family:

Public Policy's Role in Strengthening Families" and Dennis Berens, coordinator for the office of rural health in Nebraska, who will speak about "Communities for Tomorrow's Families."

Betsy Bergen, professor of human development and family studies, will speak on behalf of the College of Human Ecology. Her presentation is titled "Family Relationships: They Can Be Great!"

"We are looking at issues as they affect families in Kansas today. These issues include family relations, policies and what extension homemakers can do to promote family wellness," Mark said.

"Not all families are shaped the same today. Issues change as families change through the years. Extension homemakers look at family strength from the individuals and community action projects that they can take on."

The conference registration fee is $30. Meals and tours require an additional fee. For more information, call the K-State Division of Continuing Education Registration Office.

Leaders call for probe into FBI info leak

WASHINGTON (AP) — The FBI will investigate the leak that led sexual harassment allegations against Clarence Thomas to become a public part of his Supreme Court confirmation process, Senate leaders said Sunday.

Senate Majority Leader George Mitchell, appearing on NBC's "Meet the Press," said an investigation should and would be conducted.

"The question is the scope of the investigation," he said. "I have said right along that this should be an investigation not just of this leak, but of other recent leaks as well."

Minority Leader Bob Dole, R-Kan., said the investigation should focus first on the leak of allegations by University of Oklahoma law professor Anita Hill that Thomas made sexually harassing remarks to her when she worked with him at the Education Department and later at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission.

Who killed the Kingfish?

BATON ROUGE, La. (AP) — The tomb of the man labeled by history as Huey P. Long's assassin was opened Sunday as a forensics sleuth hoped to settle questions about the death of the Louisiana political legend.

Aware of the tombs of other family members nearby, workers carefully scraped away 19 inches of hard dirt on top of the vault of Dr. Carl Austin Weiss, who died in a hail of bullets along with Long in 1935.

If traditional historic accounts are correct, Weiss, a 29-year-old physician, shot the "Kingfish" as he strolled down a state Capitol corridor, then was killed by Long's bodyguards.

Questions have arisen on whether Long was fatally wounded by his overeager watchdogs who pumped dozens of bullets into Weiss outside the Senate chamber.

Long, Louisiana's governor from 1928 to 1931, was killed at age 42 when he was a U.S. senator. After moving to Congress, Long left behind a crony as figurehead governor, O.K. Allen, who took his orders from Long.

Radio club helps Boy Scouts

Participation marks first time for local troop

TRISTAN MOHN
Staff Writer

Seven Boy Scouts huddled close to Eric Smith, senior in electrical engineering, in the radio "shack" on the fourth floor of Seaton Hall.

Intensely, they watched him fiddle with the knobs on the radio transmitter/receiver, which emitted strange beeps and squeals as he skimmed across the frequencies.

"That sounds like you just won a Nintendo game or something," said Doug Case, a Clay Center seventh grader. The group erupted with laughter.

Saturday afternoon, Troop 54 from Clay Center traveled to K-State to participate in Jamboree On The Air. The national program sets aside a specific time and date to allow Scouts from across the United States to communicate by two-way radios.

The K-State Amateur Radio Club volunteered its time and equipment, located on Seaton's top floor, so the Scouts could participate in the program.

"Eric is in control of the equipment. As long as he's there, we can let non-licensed people talk," said Jeff Smith, senior in electrical engineering and club president.

Even though Jamboree On The Air has been going on since 1958, this was the first time the troop and the radio club participated.

"They're not nervous talking, which is surprising," Jeff Smith said. "They're really anxious to talk to people in these other states."

He said the Scouts wanted to make contact with foreign countries, such as Iraq and Russia, but it was too late to tune in to that part of the world.

When Eric Smith, club station manager, made contact with a Scout from Illinois, he handed the transmitter to eighth grader Matt O'Donnell who proceeded to fire one question after another at the boy on the other end.

O'Donnell asked the Scout if he had a girlfriend, and the whole troop snickered. They burst out laughing when the Scout on the other end asked O'Donnell the same question and he said, "That's private."

It's possible he responded that way because his mother, Shelly O'Donnell, was in the room. As a troop committee member, she volunteered to drive the boys to Manhattan.

Boy Scout Matt O'Donnell, Clay Center Troop 54, talks with scouts in Illinois by short-wave radio from the K-State Amateur Radio Club's shack in Seaton Hall Saturday. They were participating in Jamboree On The Air.

"I was the brave one," she said.

"But this is a good way to give them an incentive to work on a radio merit badge."

A radio merit badge is one of more than 100 merit badges the Scouts can work to receive, she said.

Matt O'Donnell and eighth grader Michael Holt are taking classes toward that badge.

"We're just starting the class," Holt said. "We've done a little bit of Morse Code so far."

Even though Jeff Smith gave up most of his Saturday afternoon to help the Scouts, he said he didn't mind.

'Survival game' sweeps country

Popular on both coasts; gradually reaching Midwest

JAN DUNLAP
Collegian Reporter

It's the ultimate game of cops and robbers.

The "Survival game" is an international sport that uses carbon-dioxide powered guns with paint-filled balls as ammunition.

Fanatics call it fun, exciting and safe.

The object of the game is to retrieve the other teams flag and at the same time eliminate your opponents by shooting them with a paintball. While in the process of eliminating the other players, however, you must defend yourself too.

If you get hit, then your out of the game until the next one starts.

Chris Backman, owner of Krazy Kris' Novelty and Paintball Supply, said that the sport is really popular on both the East and West coasts but is slowly sweeping the Midwest.

"It's a safe action game that provides exercise with no physical contact," he said.

There's a wide variety of guns and a number of different paintball brands to choose from.

"It just depends on how much you want to spend," Backman said.

Guns cost anywhere from $85 to $500. The rental cost for a day, however, ranges from $12 to $20. The price of the water-soluble paintball is 6-8 cents a ball.

Most people rent the guns when they come out to play on the weekend and then return them that same day, he said.

"We hold a game every Sunday at a different field, and when you sign up to play, you also get insurance."

Goggles and other protective gear are also available to rent at the field. Backman said that in order to purchase a gun from him, you must be 18 years old.

"Too many young kids are ordering guns from magazines and using them for things other than the sport," he said. "This ruins it for those serious about the game."

Eric Keating, junior in journalism and mass communications, said it's like being in a real war.

The most popular game is called "Capture the Flag."

One variation of this game is called "Save the President." In this game, a dummy of the president is put on the field to be returned by either team to their side without the president getting shot.

"It's really a lot of fun," Backman said. "There's nothing scary about it because we don't use red paint."

Doug Wilt, sophomore in graphic design, said that he doesn't get to play as much as he would like to.

Wilt, Matt Kennedy, senior in animal science, and Jon Oden, junior in physical education, have joined to help some organizations raise money.

The three bought a bunch of guns and call themselves the "Splat Survival Encounter." They help organizations such as the K-State Union, Haymaker Hall and Tau Kappa Epsilon fraternity put on games. The cost is usually $12 to play.

The money made from the game is then divided; part goes back to their business, part to the organization.

Wilt said that they already have three games scheduled within the next month.

"Basically, it's a lot of good fun, working with the teams and all," he said.

Backman said that he hopes more and more people will find out what a great sport it is.

"It's a great stress reliever," he said.

"I feel secure here because of the security system," Walters said.

"It has made a big difference for students, and the receptionists no longer have to place themselves in a vulnerable situation," Proite said.

Previous to the installment of the Validine Access System, the receptionist would have to admit visitors into the building after a certain hour of the evening.

There are two access points for each hall, Proite said.

Peace Week set aside to educate against violence

Violence against women must stop. That's the message at K-State this week, as BrotherPeace Week kicks off at 12:30 p.m. today with a presentation in Union Plaza. Sponsored by Women and Men Against Rape, the week's goal is to break the silence so often associated with violence against women.

With that goal in mind, events scheduled during the week include panel discussions on various topics relating to men's and women's roles in society, a video presentation and a lecture by Russ Funk, coordinator of the Men's Anti-Rape Resource Center.

Hopefully, there will be a good turnout at these events. The key to stopping the cycle of violence lies in getting information.

Women must learn that if violence is used against them, it's not their fault.

And men must learn that violence, physical or verbal, is never an appropriate response to any situation. Real men don't abuse women.

BrotherPeace Week alone will not put an end to the problem of violence in Kansas, in Manhattan or even at K-State. But there is a lesson BrotherPeace Week does have to teach: People know the problem of violence is out there. And they want it to stop.

Educating the masses means adding classes

If K-State is going to stick with open admissions, there needs to be more of a support system in the English department.

As it is, all freshmen are required to take Composition I. With the budget crunch, GTAs are stuck teaching 26 or 28, rather than the preferred 21 students, and individual help is more scarce than ever.

There are about 100 Comp I sections, but just one writing lab, which isn't much bigger than a single comp class.

This would be fine if only 30 of the nearly 300 students needed any extra or remedial help to do well in Comp I. But, as anyone could guess, this isn't the case.

Inevitably, some students get weeded out.

Either their teachers tell them before it's too late, "Hey, you may not get out of this class with a passing grade. You may want to think about dropping it," or the students flunk on their own.

So these students are left with a few unpromising options — enroll in Comp I again with a different teacher the next semester and try to pass, get help from a private tutor or friend to get the basic skills needed to pass the class, or drop out of college because they can't pass a University requirement.

One would hope the last option would be a last resort, but the fact is if these freshmen can't jump hurdle No. 1, they may stop before they get to No. 2.

The solution is for the University to offer a remedial or refresher course to be taken prior to Comp I.

Students who have trouble in math can take intermediate algebra to ready themselves for college algebra. Instead of one lab or refresher course, there are 31 sections of intermediate algebra to about 50 college algebra sections.

This makes more sense.

So whether students are advised to take the refresher based on high-school achievement — as they are now for math — or based on placement tests — as they are for foreign languages — they should have the option.

Being able to write with, at the very least, grammatical correctness and clarity of meaning is vital to any area of study or profession. So, let's live up to our open admissions "educate the masses" mission and teach all students the skills they need.

Farewell, Fajita
You will be missed

Columnist sets pet free on farm

ED SKOOG

"Who killed the pork chops? What price bananas? Are you my Angel?" — Allen Ginsberg, "A Supermarket in California"

Fajita is gone. She was the most gifted porch chicken a landlord ever evicted. She was always there with a sympathetic ear and a fresh egg. At the time of her departure, Fajita was quickly becoming one of northeast Kansas' foremost flying chickens. But it was time for her to move on. A rambling chicken.

We drove her out to Big Kev's parents' farm southeast of Topeka last Friday. It was a long drive — back and forth through the Flint Hills in two different cars. It included an extended stopover in one of the weirdest IGA joints ever.

But once we found a groove, in Kev's 1967 Opal Kadett, Fajita roosted on my lap, pecked at the window once or twice and slept the rest of the way home, her red comb flopping over my forearm like a heart in the right place.

Things got off to a bad start, though. We began in KF's car, and drove past, among other things, a spiral of ducks descending on a just-harvested field, what the I Ching calls an inauspicious omen and sign of the great sacrifice.

Then the car broke down just past Zeandale. Kev & I hitched into Wamego with a bearded preacher. In the cab of the truck, K-Rock was playing too loudly. To me, K-Rock is always too loud, but especially while in a blue truck, hitching into Wamego, penniless, with a hairy man of Jesus driving.

At the Wamego Apco, I called a camping buddy collect. He agreed to pick us up in front of Dyer's IGA on U.S. Highway 24. It would be a while before he showed up, we figured, so we investigated the liquor store.

Two locals were in there joking about the sextup cardboard Bud Dry lady. One guy would stand just behind the cutout, his arm around her bare glossy shoulders. The other guy would pretend to take a picture.

They took their 40-oz. Old Style bottles outside.

"Don't bother to wrap 'em up, toots. We're gonna drink these on the curb! For half an hour, the electric doors of the IGA inhaled and exhaled at least 50 funny-looking people, all of whom looked at us as if we were freaks. We leaned against the newspaper vending machines, gazing toward Manhattan for my buddy's car. No luck.

The two drunks were drinking in a green El Dorado. They were looking at us, too. Kev and I decided the heated interior of the IGA would be safer for two young boys such as ourselves.

It was only while playing in the frozen meats aisle that either of us remembered Fajita.

I felt bad. It wasn't as if we'd logically debated the merits of taking a farm animal hitchhiking. We hadn't lovingly tethered her to a sapling with a water dish and a croissant. No, we'd pretty much sealed her into a kitchenware box and left her in the back seat of an abandoned station wagon on a dirt road. And it was getting dark.

Neither of us said anything for a moment. Then Kev pointed at a row of ground chicken meat tubes, hemmed into the freezer by chunks of parsley.

"It could be worse," he said.

We continued through the store.

Kev found some change on the floor and bought some fried onions from the delicatessen. He shared one with me, again out front, where it was chilly, and the farm wives didn't like us. Our ride arrived, and another camping buddy had come along just to laugh at us. They laughed at us a lot, then they dropped us off at Kev's car.

Fajita, in addition to our laundry and an apple pie, needed rescue. Several scenarios played in my mind, none of which boded well for any Gallus gallus even near the car.

We drove on U.S. Highway 18. A spiral of ducks was still descending on a just-harvested field. This time we had a radio, however, and Kev plunked in the new Digital Underground album, "Sons of the P." The mothership funk groove improved our collective mood, although we smelled like fried onions.

The sun went down before we reached Fajita. The moon was close to full, though not close enough to change any farm wives into werewolves hungry enough to tear off a car door for a chicken dinner. And it wasn't. Or if it was, the pack hadn't reached Fajita yet. I let her out of the box, and she pecked at the buttons on my flannel. Was I forgiven?

We switched cargo, scavenged the wagon for anything valuable and machines. Fajita slept, and she didn't throw up, as lesser classes of pets tend to do in similar situations.

Kev picked me up Saturday afternoon. He hadn't slept, and I was trying to figure out how to react to our loss to Nebraska. We drove back, variously stunned.

I asked how Fajita had taken to the high life. Kev said her comb had straightened up and that she ran around the yard all night, chasing the guinea fowl and singing.

She will be missed.

Man busy with manly schedule

Editor, Thank you, Lisa Edmunds, for reminding me of what a whiny, bored, overprivileged male I am. We thought the Men's Movement might buy us some more time, but you chicks are pretty shrewd.

God forbid that I may have lost some of my male values — I've pretty much strayed from beer guzzling and Monday Night Football. I need to get back to my roots. I need to go out and buy a case of Bud and a television — I just hope I'm not as incompetent as some others who share my gender, or I might not be able to plug the damn thing in. Alas, I just don't see how I'll find the time to shop this weekend, though, because I have so much on my White Male Power Agenda.

Let's see, Saturday there's my Men Out to Hold Every Respectable (woman as a) Slave, or MOTHERS, meeting. Then there's the weekly meeting of the White Bourgeois Male Society, where we curtail the week's losses and successes in regards to keeping our ever-so-tight control over the lives of economic, political, religious and ethnic minorities.

Sunday is just as busy. I typically like to save the whole day to recover from the previous evening's lavish, egotistical male indulgence. Any spare time I can manage on Sunday I've slated for chawin', belchin', pickin' lint out of my navel and scratchin' my butt. Maybe I'll just have to find some other male-dominated activity to do.

Criticism unfair

Editor,

I have read the Collegian's coverage of James Owens with varying degrees of astonishment, disgust and, now, anger.

Astonishment in that none of your facts in this case are correct. The Public Housing Authority never considered this issue. My staff and I made each decision.

Disgust that anyone, even a journalist, could be so callous to subject this family, that is suffering so badly, to such an invasion of privacy. If you had only weeks to live, would you want to spend even one minute talking to a reporter?

And anger for your unfounded attack on one of my staff. Jai Atkinson is a concerned, dedicated public employee. She is doing a superb job of walking the tightrope strung between federal rules and local concerns. Before you criticize, spend just one day in Jai's shoes. While you intrude and sensationalize from your ivory tower, she is on the front lines, helping the underprivileged in our community every single day.

Challenge's bias challenged

Editor,

I am writing in response to the "Challenge" forum Students for Life had on Oct. 15. I would like to commend them for having such a meeting and allowing both the pro-life and the pro-choice facts to be discussed.

Even though it was open to both sides, I feel it was very emotionally one-sided, favoring pro-life. The forum began with a film, "The Hard Truth." This film, another one of their propaganda techniques, horribly displays aborted fetuses while heart-wrenching music plays in the background. This film failed to show one important aspect — the woman and the number of women killed due to illegal abortions.

This is an important factor that pro-life activists fail to acknowledge. Pro-life means just that — pro-life — not just the baby's life, but the life of the mother as well.

Never once during the debate did any pro-choicer state, "I am for abortions." Pro-choice simply states the belief in a woman's right to choose when her body and well-being are concerned.

No one wants abortions, but they do exist. Abortions have been present throughout history, exist today and will continue in the future. This is a very important issue, and both sides need to be dealt with as such. Women should be able to choose what they think is right for them and shouldn't be condemned for such a choice.

Vitamins popular with students

Best customers are military, athletes and body builders; exams increase sales

ULRIKE DAUER
Health Writer

Multi-vitamin pills are one of the most popular over-the-counter drugs today.

"Vitamin pills are our next-best seller after sports nutrition," said Deborah Jones, General Nutrition Center manager.

Jones said most customers take vitamins on a regular basis. The letdown they experience when they stop brings them back to the store.

"Our best customers are the military, athletes and body builders," Jones said. She said athletes with torn ligaments take specific vitamins to help with tissue repair.

At finals time, the multi-colored power pills become popular with students.

"I see a lot of students coming in during final and mid-term exams, especially students having problems keeping grades up," Jones said.

The typical student customer is a male between 19 and 22 years old who is concerned about his studies, Jones said.

Apparently, a lot of students studying for exams think an extra dose of B-vitamins, choline and inositol will do it.

"In the last three weeks, I sold nine boxes of 100 tablets of those," Jones said.

But vitamin pills sometimes make people feel worse instead of better. They get headaches, become sick or dizzy. This may be the result of too much of everything.

Some of the pills are the true hyperpower fuel engines. Two tablets of a popular product — the daily dose following directions — exceed the U.S. recommended daily allowance for most vitamins and minerals by at least 100 percent. Two tablets contain 5,882 percent and 666 percent of the USRDA for riboflavin and vitamin E, respectively.

"One-A-Day multi-vitamin preparations are safe," said Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene Health Center.

Moeller said individual vitamins taken in high doses can be dangerous, especially for the fat-soluble vitamins E, D, K and A, because excessive amounts are not excreted but stored in the liver.

Paula Peters, assistant professor of foods and nutrition, said vitamin pills are superfluous unless someone has problems getting enough of the right foods.

"They are really popular, but they are an easy solution rather than watching what people eat," she said.

Well-fed K-Staters should not have problems with vitamins because food contains many already. Fresh vegetables and fruits, grains and vegetable oils are main sources.

Moeller said some physically active people and people who skip meals benefit from additional vitamins.

He said fatigue patients, however, would benefit from stress management more than from vitamin pills, because fatigue is more often related to a

Why vitamins?

Many students buy vitamins called power pills, especially at finals time, to help cope with stress and fatigue. A balanced diet would probably be more helpful.

Vitamins B and E, reputed to be aphrodisiacs, are popular with many male students even though their effects of sexual stimulation have never been proven.

stressful life than a deficiency of vitamins.

People who decide to take vitamin preparations should follow directions and not be seduced into taking more, Moeller said.

This also applies to homeopathic, reputed aphrodisiacs, which contain mainly the vitamins B and E. These are popular among male students and not only during finals time. The effect of sexual stimulation has never been proven scientifically.

needed or asked for."

Both tenants and housing officials said they agree that communication between tenants and the department needs to be improved.

"We would like to have a live-in manager position established," Tunstall said. "In many cases, I think people didn't realize they need to call us when they needed something done."

Rangaraj said, "It would be a definite plus if someone was a resident manager here."

The housing department allows apartment residents whose kitchens are affected by the renovations to eat free at the residence hall food centers.

"Anytime you have to work in an apartment where people are living, it's difficult to be very speedy when you're renovating," Wiley said.

After the renovations are completed, the housing department plans to sustain living standards through preventive maintenance.

"We're strong on preventive maintenance at the residence halls and most other places. We probably weren't as strong on preventive maintenance at the Evans Apartments as we could have been," Wiley said.

Tunstall said, "We're trying our best to correct things and make Evans better."

Nirvana rouses KU thrashers

Fans fight, flee pit in terror, as music intensifies

ROD GILLESPIE

"Total freaking godhead."

It's an overused sentiment, certainly, but a perfect description of Nirvana's show last Thursday night at the KU Ballroom in Lawrence.

REVIEW

Nirvana has the unique ability to rouse audiences into an animalistic frenzy, and last week's show was no exception. A sweating throng of Northeast Kansas' finest thrashed with wild abandon throughout the evening.

The fearsome threesome launched into its oft-played alternative hit, "Smells Like Teen Spirit," early in the set, sparking an already incendiary crowd. Pushing, shoving, jostling and fighting for their next breath of air, loyal fans hoarsely shouted the lyrics with the band.

"I feel stupid/and contagious/here we are now/entertain us."

The crush near the stage was so intense that many fans fled the mosh pit in terror. After helping a drunken stranger to his feet for the third time, I fled as well — fearing the crush less than the prospect of wearing some wastoid loser's vomit.

I was glad I fled. I found it was easier to enjoy the show from a vantage point at the side of the crowd, where I could concentrate on the music instead of drunken idiots or the simple act of breathing.

Watching frontman Kurt Cobain wildly thrash about was somewhat of a shock. After speaking with this soft-spoken, sallow-complexioned fellow before the show, it was like watching his evil twin perform.

Earlier that afternoon, the diminutive guitarist had quietly answered questions between coughs and drags on a hand-rolled cigarette. In performance, he prowled the stage, maniacally combining gritty, heartfelt vocals with an unrestrained sonic assault on guitar.

Cobain's savage slabs of distorted strumming were complemented by a relentless rhythm section.

Chris Novoselic, a lanky, angular sort whose long arms allowed him to play his bass down around his knees, provided a powerful low-end back-drop.

your brother/everybody get it together/try to love one another right now," at the beginning of "Floyd the Barber."

Rounding out the rhythm section was David Grohl, who was literally a blur behind his drum kit. Grohl truly punished his instrument, serving up a gut-wrenching backbeat and unrestrained backing vocals.

The band's intense set showcased music from throughout its brief career. Frenzied versions of "Sliver" and "Dive" from the band's first CD, "Bleach" were mixed with spirited renditions of "Polly," "In Bloom," "Come as You Are," "Territorial Pissin'" and "Lithium" from the recently released "Nevermind" CD.

While the music retains its intensity, Nirvana has changed since its last visit to Lawrence. Gone are the funky secondhand instruments and amplifiers. Now that Geffen is footing the bills, only the best will suffice.

In the band's dressing room before the show, it was apparent this once-struggling, independent label punk rock band now has money to burn.

Emotional spectrum covered

LINCOLN, Neb. - There were tears shed on both sides Saturday. For Nebraska players, coaches and fans, they were tears of joy, tears of relief.

For K-State partisans, they were tears of disappointment, tears shed for what might have been.

But it's also possible that there were a few tears of joy shed by K-State fans at game's end.

No, Wildcat fans couldn't have been happy with the final outcome, as it was reflected on the scoreboard. A loss is a loss is a loss. But, it's worth remembering, this was a K-State team that had dropped 22 in a row to Nebraska, the last five of which came by an average margin of 45 points.

And, yes, this was on paper just another loss to the Huskers, running the string to 23.

But, no, one must protest, this wasn't just another loss to the Huskers.

This contest may have marked the day that the K-State football team finally convinced those around the country that it, indeed, has entered a new era.

The Wildcats are no more. K-State won't be automatically penciled in as a Homecoming foe any longer, as it was by the Huskers.

What Bill Snyder has been saying for weeks - make that years - about the character of his team was put on display for 76,209 in Memorial Stadium. And based on the reaction of the Nebraska fans following the contest, there are a few new believers who wear red.

After the gutty performance by the Wildcats, and no doubt aware of the history of the rivalry (if it could be called that), each and every fan remaining in the stadium rose and gave the visitors a standing ovation as they left the field.

It was small solace for the Cats, who were so close to recording the biggest victory in the history of the University's football program.

From the initial Cat drive until the final last-gasp pass fell incomplete, ghosts were exorcised by K-State.

When Michael Smith took a seven-yard Paul Watson aerial into the end zone with 7:17 left in the first quarter, K-State had a 7-0 lead. It marked the first time the Cats had led a game played between the two teams in Lincoln since 1968.

And the history lesson had just begun.

When Watson hit Smith with another TD toss, this one with 6:27 left in the first half, K-State had gone up 17-14. The 17 points were the most scored by a Wildcat team in Lincoln since October 1958.

As the game got older, the theme in the press box was one of "Back to the Future."

When C.J. Masters rumbled 40 yards with a fumble recovery with 9:15 left in the third quarter to give his team a 24-17 lead, the Cats had scored the most points any K-State team had ever scored in Lincoln.

But wait, there's more.

Watson's TD scamper from three yards out with 2:42 left in the third gave K-State 31 points on the day, the most a Wildcat team had scored anywhere on the planet against Nebraska. Next season, they'll get to try to top that in Tokyo.

And they just might.

K-State, obviously, has done a fantastic job in recent years of recruiting better players than those who wore the purple and white during most of the previous two decades.

And Snyder, it must be said, has brought - in himself and his assistants - a brand of coaching genius to this area that has never been duplicated.

But Snyder would be the first to tell you that what happened Saturday will only be significant if his team is able to take the positives from its efforts and make them into something to build on.

In seasons gone by, K-State teams would take satisfaction from merely coming close to winning games they had no business even being in.

Cats close, but fall in 4th quarter

LINCOLN, Neb. - Breathless. That's what 76,000-plus people were here Saturday, following one of the most memorable K-State football games ever.

Nebraska, ranked No. 9 in the most recent Associated Press poll, survived a huge scare from the Wildcats and came from behind for a 38-31 win in a contest that was most assuredly more than the Cornhuskers had bargained for.

"I'm tremendously disappointed with the loss," said a drained K-State coach Bill Snyder, who watched his team take a 31-24 lead into the game's final seven minutes, only to lose.

"I think our kids played well, played with great effort and a lot of heart. But we made enough mistakes not to win against a great team like Nebraska."

If Nebraska is as good a team as those around the nation think that it is, the Cats stood toe to toe with a giant for 60 minutes and failed to blink. That fact did not go unnoticed by the home-standing Huskers.

"I think they're capable of winning against anybody in the league," said Nebraska coach Tom Osborne. "They'll have to have things go right, like they did today. I think they're capable of beating a very good football team this year."

The fact that K-State didn't beat a very good football team on this day in Memorial Stadium could be traced to untimely penalties, failure to protect quarterback Paul Watson, a missed fourth-quarter field goal, and a Nebraska team that was, well, a Nebraska team.

Holding penalties and a total of eight sacks by the big play Husker defense hampered K-State's offensive efforts all day. But it was the somewhat controversial missed field goal by Tate Wright that might have marked the momentum shift that allowed Nebraska to come back.

With the 31-24 lead, K-State faced a third-and-two at the Husker 16. Halfback Eric Gallon, who had 129 yards of total offense, slipped on his third-down carry, and was stopped for no gain.

Out trotted Wright, who was to attempt a 32-yarder with 8:35 left. The snap was good, the hold by Paul Watson was perfect, and Wright's kick was ... wide to the left.

Wright and Watson, who had straight-on views, both thought the kick was good. The officials stationed under the uprights had a different idea. Anyway you look at it, the miss was big.

"That's a 10-point lead," Snyder said. "It's not over until it's over, obviously, but that sheds a whole different light on the approach to the rest of the ball game."

And the rest of the game, with the exception of the final K-State drive, was controlled by the Huskers, to the delight of the Nebraska homecoming crowd.

Less than two minutes after the Wright miss, Derek Brown, who had K-State wide receiver Michael Smith celebrates after a touchdown reception Saturday in the Wildcats' 38-31 loss to Nebraska. Smith helped the Cats score their most points ever against the Cornhuskers, catching 10 passes for 172 yards, the fourth-best effort in school history.

145 yards rushing, found the end zone on a carry from three yards out, and the game was tied at the 6:49 mark.

Nebraska held K-State on the ensuing drive, and took over again with 5:01 left. Just over two minutes later, Brown was again in the end zone, this time from one yard out. It was 38-31, but the game wasn't over yet.

K-State started at its own 27, and marched 66 yards to the Nebraska seven. Faced with both third-and-six and fourth-and-six plays from that point, Watson threw a pair of incompletions, the first intended for Michael Smith, the second for Russ Campbell.

And thus, with 36 seconds left, the excitement, and the game, were over. And 76,000-plus could begin regaining their breath.

"This was a real football game," said a relieved Nebraska defensive coordinator Charlie McBride, who saw K-State post an all-time high against the Huskers in points scored.

"This is what college football is supposed to be like. It wasn't one of those 56-0 games that everybody goes home after saying, 'Ho, hum.'"

It was, indeed, anything but a hummer. That was largely due to

Paul Watson

Watson, who completed 26-of-46 passes for 340 yards and two TDs, both to Michael Smith.

"I think we can throw against anybody in the nation," Watson said. "We've got a passing offense that's hard to stop."

McBride agreed with Watson's assessment.

"Kansas State has moved the ball on everybody, and they will continue to do so," he said. "Watson is a fine

Watson also caught Osborne's eye. "He was excellent today. We had a hard time getting to him," Osborne said. "The coverages at times broke down, but I think, for the most part, it wasn't too bad. Their guys were just doing a good job of executing."

That thought was supported by the statistics. K-State had more first downs than the Huskers, and had the ball for seven more minutes than Nebraska. The Cats ended the day with 452 yards of total offense.

"Offensively, I don't think it was a remarkable game, but over an extended period of time we played extremely well," Snyder said of the Wildcat attack.

Men 1st, women 2nd at Cal-Poly Invite

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Todd Trask grabbed the individual title and the K-State men ran to a team championship in the Cal-Poly Invitational Saturday in San Luis Obispo, Calif.

The Wildcat women finished second in their portion of the invite, led by Janet Treiber's seventh-place showing.

"Todd ran a real smart race," K-State coach John Capriotti said of Trask, who had a time of 24 minutes, 31 seconds in leading the Cats past Cal-Irvine by 15 points.

K-State got a solid effort from juno transfer Anthony Williams as well. Williams turned in a time of 24:50 to finish eighth.

"Williams ran the best race of his year, if not his career," Capriotti said. "I was really proud of his effort."

Mike Becker, who ran in the junior college ranks at Butler County last year, finished 14th in a time of 25:03.

Other K-State men's finishers included Ron Smith, 22nd, 25:20;

Billy Wuggazer, 24th, 25:42; Yared Berhane, 47th, 25:57; and Jason Goertzen, 58th, 26:00.

"I was extremely excited by the showing of the men's team," Capriotti said. "It was far and away our best race so far this year."

As for the women's competition, Cal-Irvine and K-State traded places in the team standings. The 24-point edge for the winners was due largely to the weather, Capriotti said.

"The heat really got to us in the women's race," he said. "We appeared tired, but it was only that we were tired by the heat. It was cool when we got there (on Friday), but by race time it was a lot warmer than we expected."

K-State ran the women's race without Jeanene Rugan, who stayed home sick, and Janet Haskin, whom Capriotti has decided to redshirt following yet another leg injury.

Besides Treiber's 17:41 showing, Renee Russell turned in a time of 17:58 to finish 12th, and Martha Pinto had a time of 17:59 to take 15th.

That thought repulses Snyder, who doesn't spit out the Vince Lombardi "Winning isn't everything, it's the only thing" line, but rather takes losing as a challenge to produce a different — and more preferable — result.

Snyder will be faced with a formidable challenge this week. For two weeks in a row, his team has played emotional games that have gone down to the wire.

And his team during that two-week period won a game it probably shouldn't have and lost one that it had in its grasp with just seven minutes left.

Snyder won't come right out and say it, but Watson and Nebraska coach Tom Osborne did it for him: K-State will beat a good team before the season is over.

Only one thing could erase the positives that came out of Saturday afternoon's events in Lincoln. That one thing is a collapse by a K-State team that would have to play the last five weeks of the year like the first six were the only six that counted.

If K-State does that, none of the tears shed Saturday were anything more than wasted water.

Here's betting Snyder won't allow that to happen. This program has arrived, and it's time to begin the long and rather tenuous process of making sure that steps backward aren't taken as quickly as were those forward.

Gladiators selected

6 men and 6 women were chosen Saturday

CINDY BRIGGS
Staff Writer

Tryouts for the American Gladiator competition brought men and women from all over Kansas to Brandeberry Indoor Complex Saturday.

Those selected will compete against the national touring American Gladiators Tuesday, Nov. 19, in Bramlage Coliseum.

Four men and four women were selected to compete, Charlie Thomas, director of Bramlage said. Two alternates were also chosen, he said.

Selected to compete in the men's division were Juan Anthony, Salina; Trevor Graham, Manhattan; Matt Laurie, Manhattan; and Dean Smith, Manhattan. Frank Loden, Paxico, and J.D. Hand, Manhattan, were chosen as alternates.

Selected to compete in the women's division were Mindie Dodson, Lawrence; Ann Graham, Manhattan; Cathy Huey, Manhattan and Elaine Ritter, Manhattan. Alternates were Effie Giannopolos, Manhattan, and Tammy Leach, Manhattan.

Timing in the 40-yard dash, push-ups and the ladder run; performance in a game of powerball; and a personal interview were the criteria for the selections, Jim Muller, assistant director of Bramlage said.

"They compete until they are eliminated. Once they are eliminated, they are out of the competition," Muller said.

The tryouts were open to Manhattan area residents. Muller said people from as far away as Wichita participated in the tryouts. Some contestants who didn't make it in the Wichita tryouts came here, he said.

"The competition was real tough," said competitor Gary Weed, junior in pre-law, journalism and mass communications. "Seems like most are coming from Fort Riley."

Weed finished 45 push-ups in 60 seconds and was eliminated. He said at the time he was trying out, 55 was the cut-off point.

"My shoulders hurt," he said. "I got to 45, and my shoulders went out. I'm going to Lafene first thing Monday morning."

Events were going on simultaneously, making it impossible to see everything. Most of the audience members, however, focused on the powerball competition.

Dressed in helmets and knee pads, men battled men and women battled women in what looked like a cross between pro wrestling and basketball.

The offensive player tried to drop the ball in a trash barrel while the defensive player tried to grab it. Powerball contestants were judged on their overall scores and performances, Muller said.

"I'm ready. I'm psyched. I have nothing but adrenalin and aggression," said Mindie Dodson, selected competitor.

Israel

the most right-wing in Israel's history, feared that the conference would force Israel to withdraw from land it seized in the 1967 Middle East war. The officials also wanted assurances that members of the PLO would not attend.

In the end, the minister decided to take a chance.

"Why should we block the way for any one of our children or citizens, to tell them there is no chance for peace?" said Interior Minister Arye Deri. "This is the meaning of a vote against."

He said he believed a U.S. letter of assurances negotiated over several months guarantees American support for Israel's demand that no Palestinian state be created.

The government has repeatedly said it will not trade land for peace, as demanded by Palestinians.

Health Minister Ehud Olmert, a close ally of Shamir, said he shared concerns that Israel may be pressured to give back territory. But he said Israel could best defend its right to the land by going to the conference.

Olmert also minimized concerns that Israel was not shown a list of 14 Palestinians who will attend the conference to ensure that none had formal ties to the PLO.

The principle has been accepted that the PLO will not take part, Olmert from consulting the group.

"The prime minister has said, 'What can we do? We cannot chase the PLO off the face of the earth. They exist and if someone wants they can talk to them,'" Olmert said.

At the other end of the spectrum, Housing Minister Ariel Sharon, the most outspoken conference opponent in Shamir's Likud bloc, said the Cabinet was not holding firmly to Israel's refusal to cede occupied land to the Arabs.

"We capitulated," he said. "We did not stick to any of our demands. Not a thing remains of Israel's positions and principles."

Sharon said the government should resign. Israel radio said he harshly criticized Shamir in the closed meeting.

He told the radio that Shamir "has led Israel on this mistaken path and continues to anesthetize the people against ... really terrible dangers."

The others who voted no were Science Minister Avai Neeman of the ultra-right Tehiyah, or Renaissance, party, and Rehavam Zeevi, a minister without portfolio whose Modelot, or Homeland, party advocates expelling Palestinians from the occupied lands.

Shamir had announced on Friday that he expected Israel to attend the peace conference and recommended that the Cabinet accept the invitation issued by the United States and the Soviet Union.

Baker has made eight trips to the Middle East to press Israel and the Arabs to go to the conference.

Baker on Saturday tried to temper expectations of the conference, and Sunday Soviet Foreign Minister Boris Pankin followed suit. On arrival in Jordan, he said, "Nobody can guarantee the outcome of the peace conference."

But President Bush said Sunday he was encouraged by Israel's plans to attend.

The United States has said the conference should be conducted on the basis of U.N. Resolution 242, which calls on Israel to withdraw in exchange for peace.

Hostage

journalism instructor at Beirut University College; and Jesse Turner, mathematics professor at the latter college.

Two Germans, a Briton and an Italian are also hostages.

Lebanese state television quoted unidentified sources as saying either Cicippio or Turner would be the freed hostage.

Cicippio, of Norristown, Pa., was kidnapped from American University Sept. 12, 1986. Turner, of Boise, Idaho, was abducted Jan. 24, 1987.

Last week, the group holding Turner and Steen invited Turner's Lebanese wife to come to Beirut with her daughter, Joanne, and visit with him for an hour under U.N. auspices. That fueled speculation Turner would be released.

In Norristown, a suburb of Philadelphia, Cicippio's brother, Thomas, said before the Lebanese TV report that he was happy about the U.N. announcement.

"That's the first time we've heard that kind of news from the U.N.," he said. "I was really surprised. This one here has got to be authentic."

He added, "It's a case of wait and see."

The U.N. information center in Beirut release a statement at 2 p.m. (7 a.m. local time) saying: "It is expected that a U.S. hostage will be released within the next 24 hours. As a result of further contacts of the United Nations envoy, a number of Lebanese detained in south Lebanon also will be freed."

The United Nations said the expected release was the outcome of an intensive stage of negotiations between U.N. Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar's special envoy, Giandomenico Picco, and a hostage negotiator identified only as Abu Abdullah.

Abdullah was described as the "special envoy of the organization that holds the hostages."

Deadly fire races through Oakland area

Blaze claims lives, causes $1.5 billion in damages

By the Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — An armada of fire trucks swarmed over the hills above Oakland Monday as firefighters contained a $1.5 billion blaze that killed 14 people. The fire — one of the worst in U.S. history — raced through affluent districts overlooking San Francisco Bay on Sunday and burned through the night, leaving at least 400 hillside homes in smoldering ruins.

The death toll rose to 14 Monday, Mayor Elihu Harris said at an evening news conference. At least six others were reported missing.

City and state officials also said nearly 150 people were injured, 5,000 were chased from their homes, and at least 200 non-residential buildings were destroyed.

Dawn brought an eerie sight: banks of gray smoke swirling above blackened neighborhoods, soft winds sighing through streets as quiet as a ghost town.

"You could see terrible devastation," Gov. Pete Wilson said after surveying the area by helicopter. "What showed up ... as burning hot spots in that black of night, this morning were clearly the charred ruins of hundreds of homes."

Wilson on Sunday declared an emergency and said he is asking President Bush to make the declaration on a national level.

Fires also raged in several Western states, including Colorado, Oregon and Washington. The largest fires were in Montana, where winds of up to 70 mph were expected to fan flames that had already consumed 200,000 acres.

In Oakland, Fire Chief Phillip Lamont Ewell said the fire was American hostage freed

U.N. secretary-general says captive Jesse Turner released; other reports conflict

By the Associated Press

A senior U.N. diplomat has reported that American hostage Jesse Turner has been released in Beirut, a U.N. spokeswoman said Monday night.

Secretary-General Javier Perez de Cuellar was informed by his assistant, Giandomenico Picco, that Turner was released "and we understand that he is on his way to Damascus," said the spokeswoman, Nadia Younes.

"The secretary-general welcomes the release of Mr. Turner and he is also satisfied with the release of several Lebanese detainees in the southern part of Lebanon," according to the U.N. statement read by Younes.

Perez de Cuellar thanked "groups in Lebanon" and the governments of Iran, Libya and Syria in helping to bring about the release. "He is also grateful to the government of Israel for the release of 15 Lebanese detainees" earlier Monday, the statement said.

It said Perez de Cuellar "is prepared to pursue his efforts with all concerned for a comprehensive solution of this humanitarian problem."

humanitarian problem."

Earlier there had been conflicting reports over Turner's whereabouts, beginning Monday evening when an Iranian news agency said he had been released. A senior Syrian official later cast doubt on whether the release had taken place.

U.S. officials, speaking on condition of anonymity, indicated the United States had been told Turner was free, but didn't know exactly where he was. One official said the fine points of the release were being handled by the United Nations and thus were out of U.S. hands.

Reports of Turner's release came barely an hour after another Shiite group, Islamic Jihad, warned that renewed Israeli air raids on south Lebanon could hamper U.N. efforts to win freedom for the Western hostages. This group claims to hold Americans Terry Anderson and Thomas Sutherland, as well as Briton Terry Waite.

An editor in the Beirut office of the Iran's Islamic Republic News Agency

IN THE MIDDLE EAST

■ U.N. officials say U.S. hostage Jesse Turner was released Monday, but a Syrian official says he doubts if Turner was released and U.S. officials do not know his whereabouts.

said Turner was set free at 8 p.m. (1 p.m. CDT). The editor, who refused to be identified, said he had no further details.

He did not know where the 44-year-old computer science professor had been let go.

Nine Westerners, including Turner, are being held in Lebanon.

Earlier Monday, Israel freed 15 Lebanese prisoners. The releases began eight hours after the Islamic Jihad for the Liberation of Palestine said it would release a hostage within 24 hours, or by 5 p.m. CDT Monday.

The group also holds American Alan Steen. It did not mention either captive by name, but its statement was accompanied by a picture of Turner.

The prisoner releases occurred despite the ongoing battle between Israel and Shiite Muslim guerrillas in southern Lebanon.

The other group holding Westerners, Islamic Jihad, issued a statement later saying the Israeli raids into southern Lebanon on Monday threatened the delicate process.

Israeli warplanes blasted a guerrilla base of the pro-Iranian Hezbollah, or Party of God, wounding three civilians. The raid came a day after a Hezbollah bomb attack in the same region killed three Israeli soldiers.

Hezbollah is believed to be the parent group of Shiite factions holding most of the eight Westerners missing in Lebanon.

The Arab prisoners released included 12 Shiites and two Greek Orthodox Christians.

Fate of $2 million gift unknown

Farrell Library may not get contribution if referendum fails

TRISTAN MOHN
JODELL LAMER
Staff Writers

The fate of a $2 million alumni contribution to Farrell Library is unknown.

Todd Heitschmidt, student body president, suggested Farrell will not receive the money if a student referendum fails at the November elections.

"That was implied from (KSU) Foundation, but we're not for sure," Heitschmidt said. "There is a good possibility if the referendum doesn't pass the donors might withdraw the donation."

The referendum will decide if current bonds due to expire will be used to fund expansion and remodeling of Farrell and the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex. The two projects will be decided by separate questions on the ballot.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, was also uncertain of what could happen to the donation if the referendum fails.

"We really don't know for sure," Hobrock said. "It has been hinted that if the referendum doesn't pass, the money may be used elsewhere."

He said if the referendum does pass the Foundation will be obligated to raise an additional $3 million to match the students' $5 million contribution.

"It's clear to me that the $3 million will be lost if the student referendum fails to pass," Hobrock said.

Bill Manning, Foundation constituent development officer and coordinator of the Farrell campaign, said the possibility of losing the $2 million really hasn't been addressed by the Foundation.

"There's no merit to the gift not coming through if the referendum isn't passed," Manning said.

The donors didn't give this with the idea of trying to get students to pass the referendum, he said. The donation was a response to student activism.

"They're convinced that students are committed to enhancing facilities at K-State," Manning said.

The proposed expansion and remodeling of Farrell will depend on both the referendum passage, alumni funding and a contribution from the State of Kansas for the project to get off the ground.

Hobrock said the Student Senate bill authorizing the referendum gives the state until 1996 to fund the project, or the student contribution will become invalid.

Heitschmidt said the possibility of state funding will hinge on what happens with the referendum.

"If the students don't pass the referendum, we will not convince the state legislature that we have a problem," he said. "Students — not just student government — have been pushing. Now they have to put their money where their mouth is."

"If they don't, we won't see a library addition for a long time," Heitschmidt said.

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., reacts to the unveiling of the sign for Bob Dole Hall during dedication ceremonies Monday morning. The structure cost an estimated $8 to $10 million and still needs about $4 million more to be completed.

Senator speaks at dedication

Bob Dole Hall houses Kansas Regents Education Communications Center

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

Sen. Bob Dole, R-Kan., joined President Jon Wefald and Board of Regents Chairman Jack Sampson Monday morning for the dedication of Bob Dole Hall.

The hall is part of the Kansas Regents Educational Communication

Center and houses its offices and production studios. It also houses the television sections of the A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications and Kansas Cooperative Extension Service.

Dole began his speech with a comment that brought laughter and applause from the crowd — a reference to the K-State football team's recent performances.

"Maybe I can come back and talk the day K-State goes to the Orange Bowl," he said.

Dole discussed the implications of the center on education in Kansas.

"This state-of-the-art center creates unlimited opportunities to communicate," Dole said. "Today is all about Kansas and our commitment to education and 21st-century technology that will keep our state at the forefront of higher education."

The hall, which has been in use since this summer, was made possible by a $6-million grant from the U.S. Department of Education, which was obtained through the leadership of Dole. Four million dollars of the grant went toward construction of the building, and the other $2 million is and will continue to be used to purchase equipment for the center.

K-State still lacks $4 million that Crops stressed by drought

Wheat threatened due to lack of precipitation in southwest Kansas

By the Associated Press

GARDEN CITY — Drought is stressing the wheat crop in southwestern Kansas.

"You'd better get down on both knees and pray for rain," said Ed Boots, a farmer 27 miles northeast of Garden City. "The wheat is just laying there in spots, not sprouting."

The last measurable precipitation at the Southwest Kansas Research Extension Center was a half-inch Sept. 13. Since then, not more than a heavy dew has settled on the area.

The wheat has emerged because of sub-soil moisture left over from the summer rains, but further progress is threatened, officials said.

"Most of the wheat is up and looking very good, but we do need some moisture to ensure good root development," said Larry Kater, agriculture extension agent in Wichita County. "A good general soaking rain would be ideal. We would be fixed for the winter."

George Esser, foreman for Glunt Farms in southeast Kearny County, refutes any notion of this being a wet year. He's received 8 1/4 inches since March.

"It's pretty serious if you don't have any irrigation," he said. "The pastures are super dry, and there's a lot of dust around."

During most calm evenings at Gottsch Feeder, a mile east of Deerfield, a huge cloud of dust rises from the cattle pens. Larry Christiansen, Gottsch general foreman, said dry conditions also are hurting the cattle.

"When it cools down at night and it's really still, the cattle feel good and start playing," Christiansen said. "They get dust pneumonia, and it's hard to treat."

Death loss because of dust has been abnormally high this year, Christiansen said.

"Dry weather is a big factor for every feed lot in southwest Kansas," he said. "The cattle just can't get out of it. We'd love to have an irrigation system for watering down the pens, but we don't have enough water."

"It would be nice if we could get a rain about every other week."

But no rain is in the immediate forecast, said Jim Johnson, meteorologist with the National Weather Service in Dodge City.

Fire damage minimal to Konza

Most plants were in dormant stage; effects to be studied

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

The damage to the Konza Prairie Research Natural Area in Sunday's fire was minimal since most plants were in their dormant stage, Konza Prairie officials said Monday.

The fire involved portions of five different treatment areas, said Gary Merrill, associate coordinator of Konza Prairie. The areas are burned at different frequencies.

Riley County Rural Fire Chief Del

Petty said the fire was most likely started by someone riding a motorcycle in the prairie or by a cigarette.

"The fire was about a half-mile from I-70, so it couldn't have been started from someone throwing something out of their car," Petty said. "Konza has a lot of problems with people riding their bikes around McDowell Creek."

There was a contradiction between the fire department and Konza Prairie officials on the amount of prairie burned.

Merrill said only 250 acres were burned in the blaze.

However, Petty said more than 500 acres were burned.

"I was thrilled when I won, and I'm honored to go to Miss Kansas," Eck said.

Eck prepares for her pageants by exercising, practicing her talent and keeping up on current events for the interview. For the Miss Kansas Pageant, however, she would like to lose more weight and change her talent a little bit.

Eck said her parents and people from her hometown have been very supportive as well. Several people from her hometown sent her cards and gifts.

"I'm anxious to go home and see everyone," she said.

Bonser hopes for IU-USSR

INDIANAPOLIS (AP) — Indiana University hopes to develop an American-style university in Russia.

Charles Bonser, director of the school's Institute for Development Strategies, said he discussed the topic last week in Washington with the Russian minister of higher education and science, Nikolay Malychyev.

"What we're looking at is an American university presence, but that is yet to be defined," Bonser said. The university hopes by year's end to reach agreement with Russia on studying developments of such a school in Moscow or St. Petersburg in the newly democratic federation, Bonser said Saturday.

The school has applied to a private foundation for about $100,000 to fund a six-month feasibility study, he said.

Raging roofer reneged on rebuttal

NEW YORK (AP) — A man carrying an automatic pistol and nearly 100 rounds of ammunition entered the United Nations on Monday and was arrested when he set off a metal detector, police said.

Santiago Lopez, 42, a Mexican national who lived in Homestead, Fla., for the past five years on a work visa, was charged with criminal possession of a weapon, said police Capt. Joe Lisi.

"He's a roofer and he came to speak with the Human Rights Commission," Lisi said. "Apparently, he is displeased with a worker's compensation case he has in Florida."

Lisi said Lopez, who doesn't speak English, didn't say why he was armed.

U.N. security guards grabbed Lopez after he tripped a metal detector at the visitors' gate of the General Assembly, which wasn't in session at the time.

Guards found an unloaded .22-caliber automatic pistol, two clips with 17 rounds of ammunition and a box holding another 81 shells, said U.N. spokesman Fred Eckhard.

MLK assassin wants to change plea

WASHINGTON (AP) — James Earl Ray, who is serving 99 years in a Tennessee prison for the assassination of Dr. Martin Luther King Jr.,

has filed a new lawsuit in his efforts to take back his guilty plea.

Ray filed suit in U.S. District Court under the Freedom of Information Act, seeking to force the State Department and Justice Department to turn over records on his extradition from England in 1968.

The lawsuit contended the agency has not responded to his request, which was filed in December 1990.

Ray pleaded guilty to the April 4, 1968, shooting of King in Memphis and is serving his sentence at the Tennessee State Prison in Nashville.

He has made numerous legal efforts to throw out his guilty plea.

Balloonists finally conquer Everest

KATMANDU, Nepal (AP) — The first successful hot-air balloon expedition over Mount Everest soared safely over the world's tallest peak Monday and landed in Tibet, the Nepalese Tourism Ministry said.

The four balloonists, three Britons and an Australian, reported by radio that they were fine, the ministry said. The balloons, Star Flyer I and Star Flyer II, took off from Gokyo, 15,999 feet above sea level. The balloonists reported attaining an altitude of 33,000 feet when they crossed the 29,028-foot Everest.

They said they landed at Rongxar in Chinese-ruled Tibet at 6:35 p.m. (9:35 a.m. Manhattan time).

Several previous balloon attempts over Mount Everest by other expeditions failed because of bad weather or logistical problems.

Poetry readings held at local cafe

Metaforum offers students a chance to share their work

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

Metaforum, the undergraduate English literary club, conducted an open poetry reading Monday night at Espresso Royale.

The poetry topics ranged from science fiction, God and Satan to nuclear war and love. Each reader recited between one and four poems. The readers were asked to stay within a five- to ten-minute time limit.

"This is the first reading we have put on this semester," said Erin Mansur-Smith, junior in English and Metaforum president. "The reading is open to any interested authors. You can sign up in the Mary Francis White Commons Room in Denison Hall."

"Most of the readings are written by the students but not all," said Steve Heller, associate professor of English.

"People who haven't been to a poetry reading before, or even read poetry since high school, might find it hard to follow because poetry doesn't necessarily need to rhyme anymore."

The people at Espresso Royale, roughly 50 in all, came for various reasons.

"It's a good study break; it's relaxing," said Tobee Ford, sophomore in art education.

Kristine Moore, sophomore in art, said, "I went to my first one last week. I think the reason I like the poetry readings is because I can't write like that, and I like to hear what other people are doing."

Ryan Bridges, freshman in business administration said, "I wrote a poem for my Composition I class. Our teacher said if we read it we would get extra credit."

Metaforum also publishes two semi-annual magazines titled "Breakfast, Breakfast, Breakfast" and "3 Martini Lunch." Metaforum accepts submitted poetry, art work, short stories and essays.

Fire

contained at dawn and firefighters hoped to have it under control by nightfall.

Morning commuter traffic was a disaster. The fire forced the closure of two highways that connect suburban Contra Costa County to Oakland. Bay Area Rapid Transit trains also shut down.

The ravenous blaze roared out of the tinder-dry hills above Oakland and Berkeley at about midday Sunday, racing through fashionable neighborhoods tucked between woods and canyons, many commanding sweeping views of the bay.

Early damage estimates stood at $1.5 billion, according to figures handed out by city officials. The fire burned more than 1,700 acres.

At the Chabot Canyon Racquet Club, only a few twisted metal girders remained of the main building.

The 250-unit Parkwoods apartment building was in smoldering wreckage.

Among the victims was a family of five who died trying to escape their burning home. A fire battalion chief and a police officer also were killed, said Alameda County Supervisor Don Perata.

At least 50 people, including three firefighters, were treated at hospitals for burns, smoke inhalation and other injuries, officials said.

The cause of the fire was not immediately known. Harris said it did not appear to be arson.

Thousands spent the night in shelters, including 1,000 students evacuated from a dormitory at the University of California, Berkeley. The Red Cross said about 60 people remained in shelters Monday.

About 100 people were evacuated from the landmark Claremont Hotel when the fire appeared to be threatening it. It was spared, however.

The fire started at about 11 a.m. Sunday, a thin column of smoke above the trees.

WHO SAID YOU CAN'T GET STUDENT AID?

There are times when being able to get the answer isn't enough. Sometimes, like midterms, understanding the question and recognizing the solution becomes more a matter of speed. Working with Schaum's Outlines prepares you for the rapid recognition of problems and solutions. The more problems you solve and the more ways you see how to solve the problem, the more confidence and ability you will bring with you to your exam.

BROTHER, CAN YOU SPARE SOME TIME?

Thirteen-year-old Craig Thomas was a young boy without a father or a positive male role model. Craig's mom Nancy contacted Big Brothers/Big Sisters, and they matched Craig with a local businessman. The two have been good friends ever since. As Craig puts it, "before Bob came along, I never did anything. If I didn't have Bob, I'd be missing a friend."

Nancy feels United Way helps all kinds of people. "You don't have to be poor to need help," she says. "And you don't have to be rich to give." Craig got help at Big Brothers/Big Sisters, a United Way agency, which got help from you!

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Guns House lacks backbone in gun control proposal

Earlier this year, the U.S. Senate approved measures to reinforce gun control, including a ban on assault weapons.

The House had its chance to show some backbone. Instead, the House killed its proposed ban on semiautomatic assault weapons and large ammunition clips last week.

Lawmakers had only the nerve to strike from an anti-crime bill a provision that would have banned 13 models of assault-style weapons, along with 17-round ammunition clips such as those used by a gunman to kill 22 persons and himself in a cafeteria in Killeen, Texas, Oct. 16.

The House ignored the appeals of gun control advocates who used the Texas shooting rampage to strengthen their case.

Gun control opponents called the proposal a feel-good measure. They claimed it would have no effect on the behavior of criminals — in any way, shape or form.

These assault weapons are not blueprinted for hunting; they are designed for the efficient killing of human beings.

Federal agents find that assault weapons account for less than 1 percent of all privately owned guns.

But more than 10 percent of the guns involved in crimes are assault weapons.

Youth gangs admire them. Drug dealers value them. Persons committing crimes use them.

Maybe we cannot legislate behavior. But we can attempt to keep assault weapons out of the hands of somebody gone berserk.

Let U.S. representatives know gun control is needed.

Turn in your arms, they'll give you cash

A man with a .38-caliber pistol and a shotgun walked into a police substation in St. Louis last week and walked out with $100. He left the guns there.

His actions were part of a program established in St. Louis to eliminate some of the guns on the street and in people's houses.

Dozens of St. Louis area residents joined the man in turning their weapons in for cash last week, no questions asked.

The St. Louis Police Department hopes to get residents to take their seldom-used guns out of their closets and turn them in for cash.

The program is funded by local businesses and the police department. The guns taken in will be checked for connections to crimes and checked to see if they are stolen.

Then the weapons will be melted down and made into a memorial for a 9-year-old boy killed when he was used as a shield in a shootout between two drug dealers.

Manhattan is no mecca for drug-related violence and is not known for drug running and shootouts. But this program would be good to implement in the community to get rid of some unused guns and prevent accidents.

Us against ourselves

Violence, separation of racism tears world apart

GILES KYLE GUEST
Giles Kyle is a junior in chemical engineering.

I was walking home from class the other day, and in my boredom I was listening to a woman and a man discussing a test he'd just taken.

He said, "I wish I could take every Indian that didn't die in Bhopal and kill him or her myself."

I gathered that his teacher was from India and gave a fairly difficult exam, and in his need to vent, the student joked about genocide.

Hitler had a similar concept.

I had a hunch the woman talking was not from India, so I turned around to discover they both had fair skin. From behind, however, they could have been any color. I liked it better that way.

I wish this was the only racist remark ever spouted from someone's lips, but the truth is, we are swimming in it, drowning in it.

I guess I do not wonder, then, why a carload of black-skinned men from Junction City came to Aggieville a few weeks ago and beat up eight white men for being white.

Of course, you won't read this in the Manhattan Mercury or the Collegian, just like you won't read rape reports, which scare off potential freshmen.

We don't hear that people are knifed and beaten in Aggieville every year in race-related violence. The only color that is truly universal is green.

Naturally, humans have a need to belong to groups to identify, but what is absurd is the unifying component of the group.

Picture a land where black-skinned persons gather with others of the same color, as do whites, oriental, Indians, etc. Let's refer to this as Union Stateroomland.

Why is color the bond of these groups rather than ideology?

In my most inane, sinister dreams I could not contrive the idea that the color of people's skin would decide who their friends would be, what kind of job they'd attain or the neighborhood in which they'd live.

What if we lived in a place where the size of our noses determined the rest of our lives?

We could establish the scene of big noses sitting in the corner of the K-State Union Stateroom, with petite noses in the center and crooked noses in the adjoining room.

And all the crooked noses had to watch movies where the villain had a crooked nose and the hero had a petite nose.

And all the crooked noses had to work twice as hard as a petite nose to earn an equal amount of respect. If there was a place like this, I'd be in a bind.

I realize this is an idiotic parallel to draw, but it is idiotic because it is absurd or because it is parallel?

I have to say I'm disappointed with the human race to date. We've developed this wonderful gift called a cerebral cortex, which gives us the ability to use logic and to express emotions. Yet we are lower than any animal I've ever seen — we use our gift against ourselves.

I'm convinced that if we didn't have the adaptive melanoma-induced skin tone, we would resort to nose or foot sizes.

Yet I find people are basically good, and our evil comes mostly from our conditioning.

I used to think true power to change our world came in the form of engineering, but I was mistaken. True power lies in our education majors, for they have the ability to cancel millions of bigoted parents. In essence, changing minds and lives to the extent that perhaps college students will one day read this article and wonder just what the hell I'm talking about.

You could scream, "Racist," but in this Catch-22 situation, I am considered racist whether I discuss a racial problem by acknowledging the differences in skin color or if I ignore the racial tensions. Therefore, all I'm expected to do is watch the condition fester and subsequently explode.

And you can yell, "Politically correct, liberal baboon," if you choose. However, reprimanding "politically correct" statements is merely a ploy by the tall, white, male hierarchy to divert attention from the truth: There are societal problems, and this country will someday shriek to a crunching halt unless they are solved.

Don't think for a second, however, I'm absolving non-whites from any blame. Some of the most racist people I've ever met did not have white skin.

We are all to blame, and we are all in this world together. Therefore, humans need to eventually discuss racism, for we are floating on a pendulum where it is not acceptable to permit reverse discrimination and racist non-white speakers without repercussions.

Yet when a white K-State senator says "people" when referring to Black Student Union members, there is a massive swell crying for a resignation. I'm frightened of the pendulum swinging back again.

You do see the growing numbers of white supremacists and Ku Klux Klan members? Perhaps not yet.

What is painfully ironic is that in trying to prove my point, I have used exactly the tool I am suggesting we destroy — that of labeling by skin color and nationality. Sadly, this is the only avenue through which anyone will understand my message.

The answer to our whole mess is simply that we are all individuals first and colored last. Still, we are not allowing ourselves peace. Bob Marley summarized this best when he said, "Until the color of someone's skin is only as important as the color of someone's eyes, there will be war."

I guess my hope for the future is that the next time I'm in Aggieville when someone is pounding my head on concrete, while I'm choking on pieces of my teeth and gums, I deserve it for something I did and not for something as minuscule as the color of my skin.

HOT on the Hill

Thomas hearings shake up Congress

JASON HAMILTON

A lot of people are gnashing their teeth in frustration on Capitol Hill this week. Even more are sporting their "I-just-boffed-the-neighbor's-Irish-setter" grins. Some are just disgusted.

Clarence Thomas was confirmed by the Senate, and confirmation hearings may never be the same again. The whole sordid mess stinks, not of sexual harassment, but of political posturing and legal incompetence.

After all, what exactly happened? Our president, true to form, looked for a nominee who would appeal to as many people as possible and still uphold Bush's own political beliefs, rather than looking for someone who would do a good job.

What he found was a man with no opinions of his own. He found a man who wanted to be confirmed on the basis of his character. He found a judge who scored the lowest ever on the American Bar Association's rating of a judge's qualifications.

How exactly did Thomas want us to view him? Whenever we asked about something he had written or said, he just shrugged and told us not to take his earlier opinions seriously. His stated opinions simply related to what job he was doing at the time, and he has had several different employers.

Translation: "I was just sucking up to whomever I needed to suck up to, and none of it means anything now."

So, we Americans asked during the hearings, why should we take anything you say now seriously? Won't you just be sucking up to your patron party and the senators who have to confirm you?

"Well," Thomas said, "ignore my political and legal beliefs. Confirm me because I am an upstanding citizen, a pillar of good character, an outstanding example to the black community and to the world, and an all around nice guy."

"Hmmm," we said. "What's this? You're being accused of sexual harassment!"

And from that point on, the hearings were a joke. I don't care if Thomas is a slimeball, a pervert, a Satan worshiper or a space alien. None of it has any bearing on his performance as a Supreme Court justice.

What does have a bearing on his performance was dropped out of the hearings in the initial skirmishes. When dealing with a Supreme Court nomination, there are more important things than determining whether or not the nominee is a sleaze on a personal level.

One of the more important things is determining whether or not he's a sleaze on a professional level. And it seems that he is.

Thomas re-creates himself for every job he holds. None of his official opinions are his own. Thomas wisely holds the opinions of his employers.

But now that he has been confirmed, what will his opinions be? He no longer has to answer to any employer. He can do and say anything he wants. Finally, we will find out what Thomas' legal views are, and we will find out the hard way.

I'm not trying to trivialize sexual harassment. It is a serious problem, and the Hill/Thomas situation is very educational. Whether or not Hill is telling the truth, we can learn about societal views by listening to what is said about her.

Calling Hill (who by all indications is a down-to-earth professional) a troubled woman, and claiming her allegations arise from her frustrated fantasies about Thomas is a textbook example of male insensitivity to sexual pressure felt by females. And claiming that because she stayed at her job and didn't say anything for years means harassment never happened shows a basic ignorance of what women sometimes go through. It reflects heavily on the character of this narrow-minded "good-old-boy" network we keep re-electing.

But this is not something that should become an issue in a Senate confirmation hearing. The Senate should be concerned with Thomas' nearly nonexistent qualifications and his unknown legal views.

Despite the fact that Thomas has asked us to ignore everything about his past except for his sterling character, and despite that this character may very well be tarnished, Thomas was confirmed.

Some of my friends believe Thomas will be a wonderful judge, one who will pay attention to what the Constitution actually says rather than what people want it to say. They think he will be a refreshing change from the career judges who populate our upper courts.

They might be right. Thomas may be the best thing since toilet seat covers in public bathrooms. Who knows?

Well, it's clear who doesn't know. I don't know. The Senate doesn't know. Heck, maybe even Thomas doesn't know. But we're all about to find out. That, we know.

Jones prepared for 2nd chance

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Painful. That seems to be the most fitting way to describe K-State's 1990-91 basketball season. Watching the Wildcats struggle to a 3-11 record in the Big Eight required endurance and provided little enjoyment for K-State followers.

It may have been most painful for Ski Jones, who was named to the All-Big Eight freshman team two seasons ago. Confined to the sidelines for the entire season by a broken ankle, Jones had to deal not only with the agony of defeat, but also the knowledge that his contribution could have made a profound difference.

Jones had to live with that disappointment through more than a year of rehabilitation. The ankle, however, is finally nearing full recovery, and Jones has returned to the court with renewed fervor.

"Last season was really tough, watching and not being able to be a part of the game," Jones said. "That just made me work harder to come back. It was a learning experience and made me want to come back and do the things the team needed."

The thing the team needed most is the one thing Coach Dana Altman said Ski Jones can provide — better shooting. Last season, the Cats clanged away to the tune of 44.7 percent in the conference.

"Everyone knows we had big problems shooting the ball last season," Altman said. "Ski Jones is probably our best shooter and will make a big difference in improving in that area. He has worked very hard on his shooting since his freshman year and is greatly improved."

In the 1989-90 season, Jones came on strong, starting in 10 games and averaging 10.8 points after the start of the conference season. He provided a glimpse of the shooting touch Altman now anticipates during the final 11 games of his freshman season, connecting on better than 50 percent over that stretch.

But Jones' return finds him placed in a different role. As a true freshman two seasons ago, Jones followed the lead of experienced performers like Steve Henson and Jean Derouillere. Though only a sophomore in experience, however, Jones now finds teammates looking to him for leadership. The new role is one both Altman and Jones agree he fills capably, if not naturally.

"Ski is not a yeller and screamer, he's a pretty quiet individual, but he has good basketball savvy," Altman said. "He won't be real vocal, but he leads in other ways. He passes the ball very well and always works very hard. Those types of things have a tendency to wear off on your teammates."

The frustration of last season drove the sophomore to improve on his initial season. After spending several months on crutches, Jones supplemented his ankle rehabilitation with as much time on the court as doctors would allow.

"I wanted to make sure I was fully recovered before I tried to do too much," Jones said. "But I made sure I didn't let the time go to waste. I went out to the Rec a lot and walked up and down working on ballhandling and shooting. I played as much as I could, trying to get the feel for the game back."

Though last season was a difficult one for Jones to endure, he said it will prove beneficial in the long run. Not only has he been able to concentrate on his shooting and ball handling during the layoff, but he has also seen his mental skills develop from studying the game from the sidelines.

"I think it really helped me last year sitting out," Jones said. "I feel like I got a lot better knowledge of the game from watching last season. I got a lot better feel for game situations, what I should do if I was this person or in this situation."

Jones said the injured ankle feels comfortable when he is on the court and that his performance is not hindered. Altman said he didn't think Jones' ankle had reached 100 percent, but said he hoped Jones would be back in top condition by Dec. 1.

K-State fans received a preview of the improved Jones Thursday in the "Slam It with the Cats" basketball practice as he scored five points.

Ski Jones will return to the Wildcats after sitting out the 1990-91 season with an ankle injury. Jones was selected to the all-Big Eight freshman team in 1989-90, the year he averaged eight points a game.

Spikers to face Huskers, hope to end Big 8 slide

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

With only one day of practice after Saturday's loss to Colorado, the K-State volleyball team will be in action tonight in Lincoln, Neb., against the Nebraska Cornhuskers.

Nebraska, which is 6-0 in Big Eight Conference action and 14-3 overall, will return to the court after a 12-day layoff hoping to continue its seven-win streak.

On the other side, K-State will try for its first win in the conference. The Wildcats are winless in five league matches and have an overall record of 9-13.

K-State has met the Huskers twice this season and has lost both times. Coach Patti Hagemeyer said her team has learned from the previous meetings — a pair of three-set defeats.

"I think the team has learned that they can sideout with Nebraska," she said. "We know how they are playing, and we are prepared to walk in there and play them."

But to be successful against the Big Eight power, Hagemeyer said the Cats must be more consistent than they were Saturday when Colorado dominated the match after the opening game.

Hagemeyer added that while the team did not play its best volleyball, there was still some improvement. "We accomplished one of our goals," she said. "Before the game, we wanted to outdig Colorado. And we did by 11 balls."

One of the team's goals, Hagemeyer said, is to use its strong defense to become more efficient on offense.

"Our passing has to improve to provide our outside hitters with balls," Hagemeyer said. "We also try to score points when we've got the ball. That's something that has not come very easy for us yet. But our primary goal is to play with a solid defensive line and to outdig Nebraska, which is a big challenge, because their players hit the ball harder than Colorado."

Women ruggers capture HOA title, qualify for tourney

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

The K-State Women's Rugby Club turned in one of the finest performances in its four-year history by winning the Heart of America Tournament last weekend in Kansas City, Mo.

K-State captured the title by defeating the Denver Rugby Club 16-4 in the championship match. Club president LaDonna Grenz, graduate student in laboratory medicine, was excited about the final outcome of the tournament.

"I think we played the best rugby we have ever played at the tournament," she said. "Everybody on the team played fantastic."

K-State, which competed against St. Louis and Iowa State in one bracket, advanced to the finals with two solid performances.

The team beat St. Louis 11-7 in its opening match despite a disadvantage in size.

"We had the smaller and faster players," Grenz said. "Our defense did a great job in holding against their big offensive players."

Marilyn Primovic and Betsy Snyder saved the win with one try each. An additional penalty kick was scored by Tracy Bartz.

The game against Iowa State was hard-fought, but the Cyclone offense could not find a way to score against K-State.

"It was a tough game," Grenz said. "I think we played good defense, and overall, we had the more efficient offense."

Becky Hamilton scored two successful tries, and Yolanda Lewis added another. Bartz completed the scoring with a conversion kick.

In the finals, K-State played Denver with Denver advancing to the final with a win over Kansas City.

Referees denied Denver two apparent tries in the match, but K-State countered with its best match of the year.

"It was the toughest game in the tournament, but we were in top form," Grenz said. "We played a great defensive game, and our forward was also in excellent condition."

Lewis, Bartz and Christy Allen scored two tries each to lead the team to the title.

"We worked all season hard with our focus on that tournament," she said. "I think we deserved the victory because we fought very hard in each game. I think the better the opponent was the better we played."

The win improved the club's record to 9-2.

"For others, the victory maybe doesn't mean much, but for us, it is the most important win," Grenz said. "We are excited about what we did."

With the tournament title, K-State qualified to play in the Western Territorial tournament next spring.

Osborne pays Cats ultimate compliment

Says comeback built confidence

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Less than 48 hours after he survived K-State's epic upset bid, Nebraska coach Tom Osborne paid the Wildcats the ultimate compliment.

Winning the game, Osborne said, "is a confidence builder."

The ninth-ranked Huskers had to come from behind in the fourth quarter and then thwart a last-minute touchdown bid before escaping with a 38-31 victory.

But how long has it been since Nebraska gained confidence from beating K-State?

At least the Huskers may start listening to their coach next time he warns them against taking somebody lightly.

"I think we certainly won't take anybody lightly," Osborne said Monday at the Big Eight's weekly teleconference. "I don't think we necessarily took them lightly."

"But sometimes your preparation and mental attitude isn't quite as intense if over the years you've had a fairly easy time with somebody," he said. "I hope that will serve us well."

The dramatic improvement this year shown by K-State, KU and Missouri didn't exactly creep up on the dean of Big Eight coaches.

"No win's automatic," Osborne said. "Today, playing in the Big Eight, there are a lot of good football teams. They make good plays. You have to play well every week to hang in there."

"I don't see the discrepancy top-to-bottom that there has been," he said. "Lots of years, we've had one or two really good teams, a couple of fairly good teams and the teams that weren't any good at all.

"I don't think we have that disparity right now."

K-State coach Bill Snyder wasn't sure what to say when asked if the game was a benchmark for how far his program has come in three years.

Meantime, Saturday's Oklahoma State-Iowa State game is being called the Doom and Gloom Bowl. Oklahoma State, despite slow, painful improvement from a slew of young players, remains winless in six games. Iowa State is 2-4 but down to its scout team quarterback.

Chris Pedersen, who started at the beginning of the year and was beaten out by Bob Utter, is lost for the year with a shoulder injury. Utter is nursing an injury. The third-team quarterback, Kevin Caldwell, had been moved to tailback when fourth-teamer Marv Seiler had to come in during Saturday's game against KU after Pedersen went down.

"I felt bad for Marvin," Iowa State coach Jim Walden said. "He did his best. But he was our fourth-best quarterback. We had to move No. 3 to running back. Now we'll bring him back to quarterback."

One bright spot for Oklahoma State is freshman running back Rafael Denson, who had a season-high 91 yards rushing Saturday against Missouri and appears to be shaking off early season injuries.

"He's getting used to the competition, and he's getting healthy," Oklahoma State coach Pat Jones said. "He's in good shape healthwise, and he's getting more confidence with his ankle. If he can remain healthy, I will be surprised if he does not continue to get better and better down the stretch."

SPORTS BRIEFLY

Masters wins weekly honor

K-State strong safety C.J. Masters was named Big Eight defensive player of the week for his performance in a 38-31 loss to Nebraska on Saturday.

Linebacker Brooks Barta won the award last week for his 17-tackle effort against KU.

Masters, a junior, stripped the football from Cornhusker fullback Lance Lewis and returned it 40 yards for a touchdown that gave the Wildcats a 24-17 third-quarter lead. He intercepted a pass in the first half that set up a first-half touchdown, and also recorded five tackles.

It was the second time in three years that K-State defensive players won the weekly honor in consecutive weeks. Barta and former defensive end Maurice Henry were selected following the Northern Illinois and North Texas State games in 1989.

Saxton honored by Big 8

Junior outside hitter Kathy Saxton was named Big Eight volleyball player of the week Monday for her efforts in a win over Drake and a loss to Colorado.

In the Drake match, which K-State won in five games, the Mulvane native recorded 30 kills with just four errors in 49 attempts. For the match, Saxton hit .531. She also recorded 11 digs. In the loss to Colorado, she added six kills and hit .250. Saxton also had 10 digs against the Buffaloes.

For the season, Saxton has a hitting percentage of .257 with a team-high 224 kills. She leads the Wildcats in service aces with 33.

Soccer Club 2nd in Chartrand

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

The K-State Soccer Club ended its fall season with a second-place finish at the K-State/Ed Chartrand Memorial Soccer Tournament last weekend in Kansas City, Mo.

K-State lost to Iowa State in the championship match, 2-0.

Coach Viktor Atughonu was satisfied with the team's finish.

"Generally, I am pleased with second place," Atughonu said. "I thought we could win the tournament, but considering the injuries my players suffered in the final matches, I am happy with the result."

K-State competed in a tournament pool with Oklahoma, Nebraska and Iowa State.

The first match was scheduled against Oklahoma. But K-State's soccer players saved energy for the second match because the Sooners failed to arrive for the game. The bye counted as a win for K-State by a score of 1-0.

The first match K-State actually played was against Nebraska, a team that Atughonu expected to be a tough opponent. And Nebraska was.

After 90 close minutes, K-State left the field as the winner on a goal scored by forward Chris Martinson. "It was a tough game like we expected," Atughonu said. "The fact that gave us the advantage was that we controlled the ball more than Nebraska."

Atughonu said the win was especially satisfying because the team couldn't beat Nebraska in previous matches.

"The team was in top form," he said. "Our goalie, the defense, the offense and the midfield were in good condition. The transition between the single parts of the team worked great."

In the final game of pool play against Iowa State, Atughonu gave some substitutes the opportunity to play. One of them was first-year goalkeeper Eric Olden.

Olden allowed just one goal after a breakdown by K-State's defensive line, but Iowa State made it stand to win the game.

In the championship match, K-State played Iowa State again. The Cyclones reached the finals with a win over Oklahoma State.

Without midfielder Jason Bergman, who was injured, K-State could not recover and lost 2-0.

"It was a bad loss," Atughonu said. "We couldn't find our ideal position on the field. We had some opportunities, but we couldn't take advantage of them."

Golf team breaks through Graham leads Cats to 2nd place

ERIC BROWN

The K-State football team wasn't the only purple-clad team that notched a mark of respectability this weekend. The golfers also took a stride forward.

The only setback the Wildcats suffered was a frost delay that shortened the Cyclone Fall Classic in Ames, Iowa, to 27 holes. K-State posted a season-best second-place finish, trailing only host Iowa State.

The Cyclones won the team title with 446 strokes, outdistancing K-State by 14 shots.

The high finish didn't happen solely because of a 10-team field that included several small schools as K-State turned in arguably its best effort of the year.

the top 11 individually on their way to one of the top tournament scores of the season. In the first round, the Cats posted a 303. In the second round, which was shortened to nine holes, K-State shot a 157. The Cats' total was 460.

Individually, senior Bill Graham led the way by placing third with a score of 112. He was in contention right down to the last few holes.

"I should have won," Graham said. "I struggled on the last few holes, and it got away."

Graham fought his confidence earlier in the season and failed to qualify for the last tournament. The troubled days seem to be over for him, though.

"He was an even par on the first round," Coach Mark Elliott said. "That's where we need him to be. He was the low on the team, and we're awfully pleased with his performance."

Junior Richard Laing turned in another solid performance by placing fifth at 114.

Another senior who had been searching to find his game was Brett Vuillemin who placed 10th.

BrotherPeace Week celebrated

Women and Men Against Rape hopes to end acceptance of sexual violence

LORI BERRY
HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporters

Women and Men Against Rape is sponsoring four days of events to celebrate BrotherPeace Week to help end men's violence toward women.

A skit called "Unmasking Violence" was performed in Union Plaza Monday.

The skit depicted the interrogation of a robbery victim in the way a rape victim is questioned. The lawyer in the scene asked the robbery victim questions like, "Have you had sex before?"

The point of the skit was to show that such questions are not normally asked of victims of crimes other than rape.

Matt Narramore, senior in economics and political science, said the skit was an example of how the myth that rape is the woman's fault is dangerous and unfair.

"Questions like this would be considered ridiculous in another crime, but for rape they're normal," Narramore said. "There's obviously something wrong with that."

Women and Men Against Rape members aim to show that men need to be the ones to start dispelling these kinds of myths.

Neil Miller, junior in psychology, said, "Being a man doesn't mean being violent. We need to realize stopping violence starts with us."

Miller said he is tired of being part of the problem and wants to be part of the solution instead.

Ramona Vreeland, sophomore in dietetics, watched the skit.

"All women are victimized by the fact that we can't be out late at night without being at risk," Vreeland said. She also said she thinks people are too accustomed to violence.

"When they hear about a crime, be it a robbery or a rape, it's no big deal — but it is a big deal."

Several other events will be featured during BrotherPeace Week. At 2 p.m. Wednesday in the Union Plaza, career women will hold a panel discussion on what women have learned in their careers that they wish they had learned in college.

Rus Funk, coordinator of Men's Anti-Rape Resource Center, will give a speech titled, "In Search of a New World Order: Exploring Equality in Gender Roles and Relationships" at 7 p.m. Wednesday in Union 213.

Another important event, event sponsors said, is a panel discussion on changing men's roles in society. The discussion will be at noon Thursday in the Union Plaza.

Campaigning imminent

Student Body President, Senate candidates prepare

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Let the campaigning begin. Candidates for student body president have handed in their applications and now must prepare their platforms, speeches and posters.

The filing deadline for SGA elections was 5 p.m. Tuesday, but no applications had been received for the position of student body president until 2:30.

The election will be Nov. 5 and 6 for both student body president and senators to represent K-State's seven colleges.

This year's election will have a slightly different twist to it, however, as the president will be elected for an elongated term of three semesters and senators for shortened terms of only one semester due to the Senate's decision to move elections to spring next year.

Although official results had not been released as of press time, several students have openly announced their intentions to run for president.

Craig Uhrich, senior in nuclear engineering and current chairman of Senate Finance Committee, said he decided to run after several people had asked him to do so.

"If no one would have asked me to run, I wouldn't have," he said. "I don't think it would be right to run just because I wanted to be student body president."

Uhrich said if he is elected president, the executive branch of SGA will be run ethically.

"My staff will behave ethically or not at all," he said. "Sometimes SGA has a habit of saying 'this is good for the students' when they really mean it's good for them."

Uhrich also said he would like to spend a lot of time talking to students as president.

"Ideally, one thing I'd like to do is not spend so much time in D.C., but rather set certain times to be in my office when anyone can come in and visit," he said. "Living groups or campus organizations could send in representatives to tell me which direction they want to see this campus go."

Todd Giefer, senior in architectural engineering, said he is going to run for student body president because he is fed up with the present system.

"I'm sick and tired of Student Government being caught up in political crap and not getting anything done for the students," he said. "Our fees keep going up and I don't see anything coming out of it."

Giefer also said he is sick and tired of people just talking and not doing.

After hearing the campus recycling program was being cut back this year, Giefer and his roommate, Curt Weitkunat, said they decided to do more than just complain about it. They both get up every morning at 5:15 to go to the K-State Facilities building and donate their time picking up recyclable materials.

"We don't get paid or anything," he said. "I enjoy giving to the community. You can't just keep taking and taking, you gotta put something back in."

Another declared candidate is Fred Wingert, junior in business administration and alumni affairs director for Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt.

Wingert said he had made the decision to run for president by the second week of classes this fall.

"I think I have unique experiences to add to the position and a clear understanding of the issues facing students," he said. "I've lived in a residence hall, off-campus and in a greek house so I can understand the concerns of all three living-arrangement groups."

Wingert also said he accrued valuable experience as former Student Body President Todd Johnson's chief of staff.

"I gained experience in the inner-workings of SGA and had the oppor-

K-State sues Steve Miller for $189,000

Former AD's obligation reason for case

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Copy Editor

K-State has filed a $189,000 lawsuit against Steve Miller, former athletic director, for the final two years of a three-year contract.

Miller left K-State last June to take a job with Nike Inc. in Beaverton, Ore. He had been the director of athletics for three years.

"The suit is for the balance of a three-year contract," said Bob Krause, vice president for institutional advancement. "We regret the action, but we feel it is an obligation."

Krause said Nike is not involved in the suit.

"It's a business situation where his contract had two years remaining," he said. "We feel we have the obligation to enforce his contract."

Current AD Milt Richards declined comment on the case.

Miller would not comment on the suit either, but he said he hoped an agreement would be reached.

"Hopefully, it will come to a close at some point," Miller said. Krause said the contract was a two-way buyout.

"When he left, he owed the remainder of the balance," Krause said. "The same would be if we were to fire him. We would have to pay him for not keeping our end of the contract."

Miller's attorney, Terry Arthur of Arthur, Green, Arthur, Conderman and Stutzman, is handling the case, which could be in litigation in Riley County District Court for up to nine months.

Cause of fatal blaze unknown to RCPD

PAT OBLEY
Government/City Editor

Although the Riley County Police Department continues to categorically deny any criminal activity in the Sept. 5 trailer fire that claimed three lives, an inspector for the State Fire Marshal's office says arson has not been ruled out.

Killed in the blaze near Keats were Julie Clark, 27, and her two children, Jennifer Harper, 9, and Steven Clark, 5.

According to RCPD Capt. Allen Raynor, the case remains open but is not being pursued aggressively.

"We haven't determined the exact nature of the fire," Raynor said. "But as before, we still believe no foul play was involved."

The fire investigator, who spoke on condition of anonymity, said the case remains open because of the lack of evidence supporting the RCPD's conclusion of no criminal activity.

"Generally, in any criminal investigation or fire-deaths case, the case will stay open," he said. "Not saying that this is definitely the case, but in a case such as this, we have not necessarily ruled out arson."

Raynor said the lack of motive or suspicious circumstances led the RCPD to its conclusion.

"Someone starts a fire by using some sort of an accelerator — taking out a match or something like that," Raynor

Fulcher debate sent to hearing; mediation failed

KU Student Body President requests public meeting

By the Associated Press

LAWRENCE — The debate over the ouster of University of Kansas student body president was sent to a hearing panel after the judicial board failed to resolve the issue through mediation.

"Because I would not roll over and die, and because I would not give in to their outrageous and ridiculous and illegal demands, there will be no mediation in this matter."

Darren Fulcher

In September, the KU Student Senate voted 42-19 to expel Darren Fulcher from office because of his arrest in February on misdemeanor battery charges for punching a former girlfriend in the face.

Fulcher and James Baucom, an off-campus senator, appealed the motion because they said it violated university and Senate rules.

The question before the judicial board was whether the Student Senate had the authority to remove Fulcher. The judicial board makes non-binding recommendations to the KU administration.

Eric Strauss, board chairman, said rules of confidentiality prevented him from discussing why mediation failed.

Fulcher said Tuesday that he will request the formal hearing be open to the public.

"I've been open throughout this whole issue," Fulcher said. "Student Senate has hidden behind their votes and behind everything they could."

Repeated attempts by the Journal-World in Lawrence to contact John Robertson, who represented the Student Senate in mediation, were unsuccessful Tuesday.

Fulcher said he has no plans to resign.

"Because I would not roll over and die and because I would not give in to their outrageous and ridiculous and illegal demands, there will be no mediation in this matter," he said. "However, for those who have expected me to quit, you have chosen the wrong person. I will not quit."

Fulcher was elected student body president in April. The Student Senate adopted the motion after it was revealed in August that Fulcher had been arrested for battery.

Kansas' long-term drought not extreme

Three-year lack of rainfall hurts reservoirs the most says meteorologist

PAT OBLEY
Government/City Editor

Though the mild weather of recent months makes it hard to notice, Kansas is in a moderate drought, according to the National Weather Service office in Topeka.

DROUGHT

"It's not an extreme drought. But all the same, it is a drought," said John Feldt, NWS deputy meteorologist.

Feldt said there are two types of drought — short-term and long-term.

"We had fairly normal rainfall over the spring and early summer. But from late summer through fall, hardly any significant precipitation has fallen,"

Feldt said.

Kansas has been in a long-term drought for the past three years, he said, which has hurt the state's reservoirs and trees most.

"The reservoirs are in a situation right now where they are required to release water, but there is no inflow into them," Feldt said. "The reservoirs will continue to drop in level until there is a drastic change."

Because of a near-normal spring, the 1991 wheat crop was not harmed by the short-term drought, said Dave Fjell, K-State associate professor of agronomy. However, the 1992 crop has already been damaged as the drought saps subsoil moisture.

"Our wheat is in trouble right now," Fjell said. "A lot of the wheat has already been planted. Some has come up in the pockets where there has been enough rainfall; some of it is waiting for rain; some has come up and died."

Though the wheat crop is in dire straits, no other crop is presently in danger, Fjell said.

"Right now, the main factor is Georgians call the cows home

MOSCOW (AP) — Cows and sows beware: Be back home before the streetlights come on or face a one-way trip to the sausage factory. Local officials in Lentekhi, a western district in the Soviet republic of Georgia, have introduced a "curfew" for cows and pigs, the Tass news agency said Tuesday.

Tass said violators are subject to "capital punishment" at the local meat-processing factory. It said there would be no compensation for the owners.

Tass gave no details about what prompted the dusk-to-dawn curfew or why it does not, for example, apply to chickens.

Ozone damage worse than expected

UNITED NATIONS (AP)—Damage to the Earth's ozone layer is accelerating and ozone levels could drop by 3 percent during the next decade, leading to a 10 percent rise in skin cancer, a United Nations scientific panel said Tuesday.

"The situation is definitely getting worse than what was expected," said Mostafa Tolba, executive director of the United Nations Environmental Program.

The researchers found that ozone depletion was occurring all across the northern and southern hemispheres in the spring and summer, which they said had never happened before.

The ozone layer, which lies 10 to 15 miles above ground, absorbs some of the sun's cancer-causing ultraviolet radiation.

REGION

Storm: The gift that keeps on giving

TOPEKA (AP) — The brevity of the Persian Gulf War is paying off for low-income families in Topeka.

Let's Help Inc., a social service agency, has received four tons of frozen beef left over from Operation Desert Storm. Three truck loads of 'b' rations also have been delivered.

Military chefs concocted entire meals for 400 people out of one carton of 'b' rations, while another truck carried a load of vacuum-sealed bread, which the military says is still edible.

Marg Roberts, Let's Help executive director, rated the quality of the food as excellent, except maybe for the year-old bread.

The Pentagon began giving away $300 million worth of Desert Storm leftovers in August, and Roberts credits a state employee for getting some of it to Topeka.

Paul Schwartz is the director of federal surplus property for the Kansas Department of Corrections.

The foodstuffs obtained for Let's Help were nearly free, he said.

Although his agency usually charges enough to cover shipping costs of the free merchandise, the war's quick end left shipping companies with semi-trailers filled with food sitting on docks in California, he said.

To empty those trailers so other customers could use them, the shipers moved the food to Topeka at no cost, he said.

At 4:46 p.m., Mary H. Wallace, 136 W. Elm Lane, Junction City, was arrested on a Riley County warrant for worthless checks and released on $750 bond.

At 5:09 p.m., a major damage, non-injury accident was reported at 2400 Himes Rd., involving vehicles driven by Dave Parker, 12460 Homestead Rd., Riley, and Dixie M. Schivley, 2400 Himes Rd.

TUESDAY

At 12:09 a.m., a male, who refused to be identified, reported suspicious activity at the Parker Hannifin Corp. Rubber Hose Facility. He said Mr. Ridder had brought a human skull to work, which he thought was suspicious. The Pottawatomie Sheriff's Office was advised.

At 2:45 a.m., an attempted theft was reported at Dutch Maid, 1522 Poyntz Ave. A white male, six feet tall, wearing a stocking cap, army fatigues and a dark long-sleeved shirt shot off fireworks then attempted to steal a pumpkin from the store. The subject dropped the pumpkin when an employee chased him. An officer checked the area and was unable to locate the subject. The employee declined a report since the item was recovered.

At 6:39 a.m., a major damage, non-injury accident was reported at Poliska Lane North of Fort Riley Blvd., involving a vehicle driven by Velma Poulin, 2415 Justin Drive, and a telephone pole. KPL reported lights out in the immediate area.

At 10:30 a.m., Vincent J. Bilello, Headquarters and Headquarters Company, 216th Infantry, Fort Riley, was arrested on a Riley County warrant 91CR860 for failure to appear and confined in lieu of $750 bond.

At 12:06 p.m., a minor damage, non-injury accident was reported at Hartford Rd. and Claflin Rd., involving vehicles driven by Joseph L. Luggen, 1529 Pipher Lane, and Darren Honkanen, 1st MP Company, Fort Riley.

At 12:57 p.m., an officer was requested to assist the Manhattan High School security guard in reference to a dispute with an irate driver who followed a student into the school parking lot. Ryan A. Olson, 958 S. Manhattan Ave., was issued a notice to appear for driving in violation of age restrictions. William L. McKibbin, 4460 Tuttle Creek Blvd., was issued a notice to appear for littering.

At 1:42 p.m., a hit-and-run accident was reported in the parking lot at 401 E. Poyntz Ave., involving an unknown hit-and-run vehicle and a parked and unattended car owned by J.D. Van Pelt, No. 30 Red Bud Estates. Damage was minor.

At 3 p.m., it was reported that on Oct. 19, at 7:52 p.m., John R. McCanless, 107 N. Main St., Riley, was arrested in reference to AWOL from the U.S. Army and released to Army officials.

At 2:45 p.m., a minor damage, non-injury accident was reported at 3252 Kimball Ave., involving vehicles driven by James D. Bersinger Jr., 1632 McCain Lane, and Elke C. Bersinger, Rt. 3, Box 285 D, Junction City.

Computer is tip of iceberg

Specialist says up-to-date information can be shared between students, faculty

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

Computing and Network Services offers a new information system on the central computer.

UNICORN, an acronym for University Central Online Resource Network was designed to provide easy access to useful information said Neil Erdwien, CNS associate specialist.

Data already in UNICORN includes a campus calendar of events, fall 1991 line schedule and K-State Union and Farrell Library hours.

Erdwien said people have different ideas of information they would like to see on UNICORN. Students would like to have the closed-class list while staff would like to have a calendar of job-related events.

"The amount of information that's in there now is just the tip of the iceberg," Erdwien said.

He said he encourages departments to add information. Students or departments may share relevant information as long as they are willing to keep it up-to-date.

"It cheapens the whole data base if someone's got information on there and it's obsolete," Erdwien said. "That makes the user think maybe the rest of the information is obsolete, too."

Joe Younger, manager of training and development in Human Resource Services included the faculty/staff training calendar and training resource list on UNICORN. He said he has also considered adding a list of classified job vacancies, but it would require a certain amount of work to maintain.

Younger said UNICORN makes information more available to people right where they are without having to spend much time looking.

"With UNICORN a person has instant access," Younger said. "It cuts down on the time it takes to search the files."

It also saves printing costs since documents can be easily updated and printed from the screen as needed.

Erdwien and his staff are currently working on programs to convert data to UNICORN.

CNS will conduct one-hour training sessions Oct. 24 and Oct. 31 to show how files can be put into UNICORN. There will also be 30-minute UNICORN demonstrations Oct. 22, 23 and 24 in Cardwell 42.

Criticisms arise from ruins of Oakland fire

Death toll rises to 19, up to $5 billion in damages

By the Associated Press

OAKLAND, Calif. — The death toll rose to 19 and the damage estimate to $5 billion Tuesday in the costliest fire in U.S. history, as questions and criticism rose from the ashes.

Did firefighters wait too long before calling in outside help? Could the deadly wildfire — blamed on a re-kindled brush fire — have been avoided? And why wasn't water available when needed most?

"We can't have a situation where people watch their house burn down," said Alameda County Supervisor Warren Widener, who believes his house might have been saved if firefighters had not run out of water as pressure dropped.

Figures released Tuesday showed Sunday's wildfire killed 19, destroyed more than 1,800 houses and nearly 900 apartments, and damaged 200 more units, said Alameda County Sheriff's Sgt. Robert Jarrett. He had no details on where the additional bodies were found.

Forty-nine people were reported missing, 148 injured and 5,000 evacuated, Jarrett said. Authorities cautioned that some of the missing may have been away at the time or had trouble contacting friends and relatives.

"Until there's a dwelling-to-dwelling count nothing is sure," Jarrett said.

Firefighters were still dousing hot spots and hoped to have the 1,700-acre fire under control by noon Wednesday.

As the numbers were tallied, homeowners began making the long, heartbreaking trek to see if their homes still stood. Some walked across 3 square miles of desolation and smoking ruins.

"It's terrible from the air, it's terrible from the ground. It's grim both ways," Gov. Pete Wilson said, standing in front of the ruins of the 250-unit Parkview Apartments.

The wildfire started when a Saturday brush fire re-ignited, something critics say might not have happened if firefighters had kept watch all night.

"The first thing you're taught is that you don't leave until a fire is very tunity to bring about progress on Farrell Library," he said.

Wingert said the premise of his campaign will be to make students the key to SGA.

Current Agriculture Senator Jackie McClaskey, senior in agricultural economics, also declared her candidacy on Tuesday.

She said she decided to run for office last May.

"I felt I had to make a decision early to plan ahead," she said. "The reason I wanted to run is I think we as Student Government have worried too much on the big picture rather than what students need here on campus.

"If elected, I don't plan on sitting around and waiting for students to come to SGA asking for help. I want to go out and say to them 'what do you need?'" she said. "I want to get the students more involved."

Roy Cessna, senior in business administration, said he is vying for the presidential position so he can make Student Government more efficient.

"I've attended most Senate meetings for the two years I've been here as a concerned student. I wanted to know what they were doing with my money," he said. "After that experience I know something needs to be done to improve the efficiency of that body."

Cessna was previously student body president of Dodge City Community College.

"I have the experience to do this," he said. "I want to get Senate back in line because I think they've overstepped their bounds in the past."

Also in the running is Collegian columnist Shawn Bruce, junior in history, who said he decided to run for the position around 4 p.m. Tuesday.

"I had been kicking the idea around for the last couple of months and made my final decision right before the deadline," he said.

A perceived lack of accountability in SGA is what made Bruce finally turn in the application.

"I decided to run because I like comfortable furniture," Bruce said jokingly. "But on a serious note, we need to bring accountability to the office of president. The axe has got to fall somewhere instead of blaming bad advice or just passing the buck."

Bruce has worked at the Collegian for three semesters in addition to working at the Manhattan Emergency Shelter for two years.

OPINION

EDITORIALS

Safety Buckle up and save yourself a whole buck

Buckle up, or it may cost you more than your life. It may cost you one buck.

Yes, $1 is the fine you incur if a Riley County police officer pulls your vehicle over and discovers you are not wearing your safety belt.

Kansas law states everyone older than four must wear a seat belt or risk a penalty of $10. But municipal judges can reduce the fine to nothing if they see fit.

Our Manhattan Judge Patrick Caffey is known for reducing seat belt violations to $1, a city employee said. Those who know him say Caffey thinks the law encroaches on people's personal freedom, and therefore, he doesn't like to punish people the way Legislature has mandated.

Maybe he feels $10 is too harsh to encourage people to do what is in their best interests. Funny, but aren't fines supposed to work on the premise that a fear of being fined deters the undesired behavior?

This is certainly proof of a recession - if $1 is enough to motivate people to do what is in their best interest, this economy is in trouble.

Why, after people know they could be nailed with a $1 ticket, they'll be sure to buckle up, if only for fear of such a tremendous fine.

This puny $1 fine will not make people wear seat belts, and it has turned the seat belt law into a joke.

A spokeswoman from the City of Manhattan Municipal Court said very few tickets are issued for seat belts — maybe five a month.

"It probably costs more than that to write out the ticket," she said.

Seat belts have a whole new meaning in light of this $1 penalty. Buckling up not only saves lives, it can now save someone a whole dollar.

Farrell Money for renovations within students' reach

An opportunity to improve Farrell Library is looking K-Staters in the face. Some dear, alumni souls have actually offered $2 million to the Essential Edge Campaign — if the money will just go to the library.

Sounds easy enough. Money like that is exactly for what everybody has been searching, and the library is just where everybody would like to see it spent.

But low and behold, there is a way to mess up this dreamy donation and the new and improved library it could bring students.

A referendum, which will decide if current bonds due to expire will be used to expand and remodel Farrell, is coming out in a few weeks. This referendum must be passed.

Originally, Student Senate discussed putting only one question on the November referendum. A "yes" answer to this one question would have approved financing improvements not only to Farrell but also to the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

Now, however, Senate has split the question, and students will be asked to vote separately on financing Farrell and the Rec Complex.

So let's vote, and let's vote "yes." Vote "yes" to both if you please but especially "yes" to renovating Farrell.

The donors of the $2 million aren't trying to threaten us, but they do think students care enough about Farrell to take an active role in financing its remodeling.

Don't let them down, and more importantly, don't let K-State students' hard-earned winning reputation down.

Vote "yes."

Referendum voting...

Students can vote on the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex and Farrell Library referendums as they vote for Student Body President and senators Nov. 5-6 in the K-State Union.

Navy's apology too little too late

It's about time the U.S. Navy stopped trying to cover up its own mistakes.

One victim of the Navy's unstable gunpowder testing was accused of criminal wrongdoing simply to stop an investigation that would damage the Navy's reputation. Gunners Mate Clayton Hartwig's family know what damage it has caused.

It's typical of the military and the U.S. government to find a dead man to be the scapegoat.

America should be ashamed of how the investigation of the April 1989 explosion of turret two on the USS Iowa, which killed 47 sailors, was undertaken and how long it took for the Navy to admit its wrongdoing.

Although the Navy has not found the cause of the explosion, it has said it could have been an accident and, finally, that it is not Hartwig's fault.

It should be no surprise the findings were not more precise. In any case, the public apology by Admiral Frank Kelso, secretary of the Navy, was a necessary gesture but long overdue.

QUALITY vs. QUANTITY

K-State students mean more than mere numbers

ERIC BECKER

Like all schools, K-State has an unfortunate preoccupation with numbers. To some extent this is necessary; the University exists in a nation of complex economic competitions. Money is measured in numbers, and numbers are part of a reality from which K-State cannot escape.

But regardless of the numbers, regardless of the budget and the enrollment, the school is ultimately about one thing — people.

People are a challenging commodity because they are not, after all, a commodity. They can be measured in numbers, but there are substantial aspects of education, experience and character, which cannot be given such a convenient measurement.

We do our best to convert these difficult-to-measure qualitative considerations into measures we can understand. The point system, upon which most (if not all) of the classes available at K-State are based, is one way we measure the quality of the learning taking place in those same classes. The points are converted into percentages, and we are given a grade based upon that percentage.

It's difficult to do justice to the quantity versus quality question in a 15-inch column, but only one realization is crucial to the point. No matter how large, the quantity is worthless if the quality is low.

The University means to reach and educate as many people as possible. This is not an unreasonable mission, but it is important that both the administration and student organizations remember the ultimate products of their efforts are not numbers but people.

It is important we realize reorganization is not dead. Budget constraints that were not altogether the fault of the University forced the elimination of several classes this semester, and continuing money problems may require the discontinuation of one or more programs in the near future.

Clearly, something must be done. The administration is engaged in a reassessment of the various departments of the University. The budget problems are formidable and a valid concern. But the wholesale elimination of a department cannot be regarded lightly by either administration officials or students. There are links, networks of classes in all of the colleges, that support curriculums outside any particular major.

Some classes could be absorbed by other departments, of course, but majors — people — in even a small department will experience a betrayal if their particular program is cut. Elimination or alteration of some departments may not bring out the crowds as last year's reorganization effort did, for those numbers may not be available or inspired.

But despite the University's preoccupation with numbers, the situation of even a few students in a small department must be considered. These students have come to K-State for a reason, and a small or specialized department may have been that reason. The circumstances of such students deserve respect.

We cannot ignore the challenges of financial constraints and considerations that play into all of this, but we must realize we are not just working with dollar signs and lists of social security numbers on a computer print-out.

The decisions made in the coming days and months will affect not only programs, but lives as well.

LETTER

Hill victim of liberal Democrats

Editor,

This letter is in response to Steffany Carrel's column, "Lost: dignity, trust, progress," in the Oct. 15 Collegian.

Steffany, you say you believe Anita Hill's sexual harassment accusations against Clarence Thomas?

Is Anita Hill a victim?

Well, Steffany, I ask you, from your own personal experience, would you return to the Texaco to get directions? Would you return to buy gas? If the service man who harassed you transferred to another station would you stop there for gas or directions? Would you keep cordial phone contact with this disgusting service man?

Of course not.

So does it make sense that Anita Hill would continue to work for such a man, voluntarily follow Thomas to another job at the Equal Employment Opportunity Commission when her job at the Department of Education was secure and keep cordial phone contact with Thomas, even after she had no longer worked for him?

Yes, Anita Hill is a victim — not a victim of Justice Thomas, but a victim of corrupt liberal Democrats in Washington.

Satirical slam shows ignorance

Editor,

Lisa Edmunds' satirical slam on the Men's Movement Oct. 18 tried to show that there was no cause for such a movement to exist. But in claiming that the only things men have to complain about are beer prices, the designated hitter rule, jock strap comfort and the complexity of certain cooking appliances, Edmunds ironically exhibited the kind of ignorance that makes the Men's Movement such an urgent necessity.

Edmunds' confusion stems from a misguided attempt to understand the Men's Movement as an "isolationist" movement diametrically opposed to the Women's Movement. Nothing could be further from the case.

The Men's Movement considers itself pro-feminist and far from wanting to reverse the accomplishments of feminism. It is eager to continue the struggle for political, economic and sexual equality between the sexes.

True, the Men's Movement does not have a political agenda in the same sense that the Women's Movement does. What would be the point? As Edmunds says, men already control most of the money and power.

Instead, the Men's Movement has an emotional agenda; men feel it is time to redefine what it means to be a man in today's society. The macho, white bread-winning, homophobic, sexually harassing jock is a worn-out and unproductive self-perpetuating cliché. It's time to incorporate into the definition of masculinity qualities that women have never been afraid to possess: sensitivity, understanding, kindness, humility, etc.

There are a lot of things in the Men's Movement worth making fun of, but Edmunds doesn't know enough about the movement to know what they are. Make fun of the constant hugging that goes on. Make fun of the fact that most of the men in the movement have either taught a course, run a seminar, conducted a workshop, sat on a panel, founded a support group, led a discussion group, hosted a retreat, organized a colloquium or written a book. Make fun of the bearded men who run screaming through the forest naked searching for their uncircumcised selves. Now that's funny.

Metalhead show evil

Editor,

I don't know about the rest of this University, but I think it was a complete waste of paper to feature such a lame, immature, naive group like DB92's Metalhead in the Oct. 14 Collegian.

How can you even justify having them in our paper? These bunch of kids have no idea what good music is. I have listened to their show several times before and have found it to be truly tasteless, offensive and quite rude.

All the music Metalhead plays is by bands like Grindcore, which don't even compare to such talented musicians as Wilson Phillips, M.C. Hammer and Amy Grant. Mr. Andrew Crow, exactly what is wrong with singing songs that talk about love? Or a struggle to succeed? Or not using drugs?

When are you going to wise up and see that the bands you play are going nowhere in the future? All they ever sing (or rather, scream) about is death, death, death. Maybe it is about time to throw away or burn all those metal albums that promote war, death, murder, bodily harm and Satan.

In addition to this, it is shows like yours that promote the illegal use of drugs and contribute to the decline of our education system. The day we stop hearing metal will be the day we can begin cleaning up our nation.

My advice to you, Mr. Crow, is to pick up a Bible and read it. Then, and only then, will you learn about the harm and evil of metal music. And after you are done, ask yourself one question — would I want my kids to act like me? I don't think so.

Raccoon loses life to speed demon

Editor,

This is to the driver of the red car that hit the raccoon on the old Wheaton road Oct. 10 at about 9 p.m. I can't help thinking that if you hadn't passed me driving so fast or if you had been more night-driving conscious, this incident would have been avoided. A matter of seconds would have made the difference between life and death.

I managed to avoid the injured raccoon laying in the middle of the lane, blinking its eyes at the oncoming lights. The truck behind me also went around it.

I intended to stop on the way back from my errand to try and help the injured animal, but it was gone by that time. I regret not stopping at the time of the incident. It may have been severely injured, but at 10 p.m., it was too dark to search for it in the knee-tall weeds.

If you are compassionate toward living creatures, I apologize for reminding you of this incident. If you are not, I hope this will make you realize you probably took a life. Either way, I hope you will drive more cautiously. Did you really have to get where you were going so quickly?

Perhaps the next time you are driving after dark, a time when wildlife is more active, you will drive just a little slower and be more alert. Animals can run out in front of a car before you know it, but sometimes they can be avoided. If you are driving at night, drive a little slower and keep alert for little eyes flashing in the dark. Perhaps if we all do this, lives can be saved.

Women should take responsibility

Editor,

Recent letters offering opinions on the responsibility of either the man or the woman for the prevention of unwanted pregnancy prompts me to offer yet another opinion.

Who ultimately bears the consequences of an unwanted pregnancy? The woman. It is her body that carries the child, not the man's. The woman bears the heartache and pain of childbirth, not the man. Moral responsibility aside, the woman should take ultimate responsibility for birth control. It is her body that will suffer the consequences.

I am not saying the man should not have a role in the use of birth control devices. It is, however, the woman who must live with the consequences of the action. And therefore, in a sometimes rotten world where a man can inseminate and run, she should always be ready to protect herself.

Perhaps someday, through education, men and women can truly become partners in this area. But until this happens, women should take ultimate responsibility for their bodies. This includes the option to not become pregnant or to terminate an unwanted pregnancy.

Undecided students abound

22 percent of freshmen have no major; University suggests advising, counseling

BEVERLY EPP
Collegian Reporter

Six percent of all undergraduates are without a major this fall.

Students who have not declared a major are categorized as being undergraduate undecided in the College of Arts and Sciences.

Michael Lynch, assistant vice president for institutional advancement, said 22 percent of the freshman class is undecided, followed by 7 percent of the sophomore class, 2 percent of the junior class and 1 percent of the senior class.

James Akin, director of the Career Planning and Placement Center, said the figures would be higher, but he believed some students declare a major to feel secure. He said students may also get pressure from their friends and family.

But Akin said the University puts no pressure on students who are undecided.

He said there is no prototypical undecided student.

They range from the academically poor to students in excellent standing, he said. Some students who have interest in and do well in many areas may find it hard to decide on one area of concentration.

"The worst thing a student can do is drop out," Akin said. "But undecided students do contribute to the drop-out rate."

The amount of unneeded hours and wasted money that result from being undecided varies with the individual.

"I believe students who major in education and then change it to something totally different, like electrical engineering, are wasting money and time because of the unrelated majors," said Bridget Emig, sophomore in arts and sciences.

Emig said she has taken a variety of classes so that once she declares a major she will graduate on time.

K-State offers several different services that can help students evaluate their alternatives.

Akin said the University suggests three steps for undecided students. The first step is to talk to an adviser, who can help by connecting students with professors who have similar fields of interest.

From these professors, students can find out the different kinds of jobs within a field, the training required and the demand for graduates in the field. Internship possibilities may also be inquired about.

"An introduction course is a good way to test your interest," Akin said. "Finding out what you do not want to do is just as important as finding out what you do want to do."

Related values, identify skills and interests, and relate information to major selection and career choice.

Lafayette Student Health Center offers University Counseling Services, which is staffed by professional counselors.

The services offer a computer-based program called DISCOVER. Developed by the American College Testing Program, it helps students develop self-awareness, access comprehensive occupation information and identify academic majors and programs according to their interests, abilities, experience and values.

There is a $5 fee per academic year to use DISCOVER.

Akin said the final step is to use a personalized computer guidance system called SIGI-PLUS. It covers all the major aspects of career decision-making and planning through a carefully constructed system of nine separate but interrelated sections.

The Career Planning and Placement Center in Holtz Hall also offers guidance.

The center has a career library with information about different careers and specific companies with starting salaries for employment opportunities.

Akin said there are also career follow-up guides that have job listings categorized by the different fields.

Though there is assistance available to undecided students, Akin said the University needs to expand the possibilities for students who have trouble deciding on a field of study.

said. "There has been nothing to confirm that."

The two men who survived the fire, Anthony and Carl Moss, were cleared of suspicion by the RCPD after telling investigators their attempts to wake the others were unsuccessful.

Both agencies said due to the degree of destruction at the site, evidence absolutely confirming or clearing suspicion cannot be found.

The only item the agencies are sure about at present is that the fire originated in the trailer's kitchen area. Autopsies were not performed on the victims because of severe fire damage to the bodies.

Raynor said investigators first checked for the obvious at the scene, the others were unsuccessful.

"We checked to see if the fire's origins were in a suspicious region of the trailer," Raynor said.

TODD FERTIG

It used to be like this

It's 5:40 a.m., Feb. 20, 1991. Huddled in a ball, buried deep in a sleeping bag, Eric is coaxed slowly to consciousness by the proddings of Derek's foot.

Derek stands hunched at the waist, his uncombed head brushing the satin lining of the two-man tent. The rising sun peaks over his shoulder and through the door left open by the unzipped tent flaps, which flutter in the brisk, morning air. Dressed in flannels, a down hunting jacket and a bright orange hunting cap, Derek stands over the rustling ball, nudging it gently with his booted foot.

"Come on, Eric, we have to go again," Derek says. "Everyone is already up. We're about to start." "We just went last night," Eric sighs, slowly poking his head from the opening of his sleeping bag. "What are they doing waking us up again?"

Assured that the sleeping bag has been successfully stirred, Derek ducks back through the opening in the tent wall and stretches sleepily while studying the glistening horizon. The sound of stirrings from other tents and the scent of bacon frying over an open flame float gently through the swirling winter gusts.

Gradually, Eric sits up, emerging partially from the sleeping bag in a crumpled sweatshirt and blue jeans. Breathing another sigh, a wafting puff of breath appears. How cold is it today, he wonders, reaching for his heavy wool coat at the foot of his bag. He slowly laces his fur-lined boots and rises to join Derek outside the tent.

"I think it snowed a little again," Derek says, assessing the powder that sweeps across the wide-open parking lot. "But it's definitely warming up. It's not nearly as cold as it was a week or so ago."

"Quite a few more tents went up last night," Eric says, turning to face the mass of tents huddled on the grassy slope. "With the KU game coming up, a lot more people are coming out."

"Yeah, makes you glad we've been out here as long as we have," Derek says. "There's no way we'd get good seats for this game if we'd waited 'til now. After the Wichita State game, I knew we'd have to camp out or else we'd never get good seats. It's a good thing we've been out here all this time."

"Yeah," Eric says doubtfully. "It got awfully cold for a week or so. Especially when there wasn't a game for about 10 days. Seemed like a lot of people left for a while."

"That's good for us," Derek says confidently. "We moved up pretty high on the list that way. We've only been out here for a little over a month. If they can't take it, then they shouldn't be getting good seats."

"I guess this is more fair than the old camps," Eric sighs, tugging the lapels of his coat tightly together. "It would be nice to be able to go somewhere if you had to, though. And we're going to be awfully far behind in our classes."

"Oh, it'll be worth it in the end," Derek soundly states. "The season will be over in about two weeks, and then we'll have the rest of the semester to get caught up. And look at it this way. At least there's no way anyone can swindle you out of your place in line this year."

"Yeah, you're right," Eric says, getting with the spirit. "Heard anything about that guy in the blue tent over there? You know, the one who had to leave before the Iowa State game?"

"I heard he got pneumonia," Derek says, a frown creasing his face. But the winter morning sun suddenly sparks a twinkle in his eye. "But hey, that's one less person that can get a better seat than us."

SHANE KEYSER/Staff

With five games remaining this season, K-State running back Eric Gallon is making a bid at being the school's first 1,000 yard rusher since Isaac Jackson in 1973. In the six games so far this season, he has amassed 457 yards rushing and is third overall in the Big Eight.

Gallon, Cats expect a lot

Junior back takes aim at 1,000 yards after missing last season with injury

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

It's safe to conclude from Eric Gallon's actions that his expectations are a little higher these days.

Following K-State's 38-31 loss to No. 9 Nebraska on Saturday, the bitter pill was especially hard for the junior running back to swallow. He flung his arms wildly like a kid having a temper tantrum.

"It took me a while to get my composure back, I guess," Gallon said.

While Gallon's handling of disappointment may need a little work, there's been little to criticize about his performance on the field this season.

Despite gaining just 47 yards against the Cornhuskers, Gallon ranks third in the Big Eight Conference in rushing with 487 yards. Nebraska's Derek Brown and KU's Tony Sands are ahead of him.

"I've got my own personal goals for this season," Gallon said. "It's up to my offensive line to help me reach them."

That dependency has been recognized by both Gallon and his blockers. Their common goal is to give K-State its first 1,000-yard rusher since Isaac Jackson in 1973.

That's big talk from a guy who had just 153 career yards heading into the season.

"The line is doing so much better than it was a couple of years ago," Gallon said. "They're holding their blocks longer. It's a lot different attitude now."

"But if we keep winning and doing all this, I don't have to reach that goal to be successful."

Gallon appeared to be well on his way to the milestone during the non-conference season. He started the year with 184 yards on 27 carries in a 26-25 win over Indiana State.

"I tried real hard to pile up the numbers during (non-conference games)," Gallon said. "It's hard to get the yards against Big Eight teams."

"It's a big, physical conference. We all knew we would throw a lot more once the Big Eight season started."

Gallon asked K-State coach Bill Snyder not to forget him with the change in game plans. So far, he hasn't. Gallon is fourth on the team in receiving with 12 catches for 137 yards.

He benefited from quarterback Paul Watson's 340-yard passing day at Nebraska with six receptions for 82 yards.

"Coach says I can catch the ball, and I'm glad he's given me the chance to show it," Gallon said. "I want to be two-dimensional. It's great to have the ball in the open field and be able to pick your spots."

Also making Gallon's season sweet is the Wildcats' 4-2 record, a feat the junior believes has sparked a change in atmosphere around campus.

"I'm still the same old person," Gallon said. "But when I get up in the morning, it's a little different. You can go to class and stand proud because people are behind you."

That support was hard for Gallon to accept when the team returned from Lincoln Saturday night and fans offered praise for the Cats' effort.

"It was kind of insulting at first," Gallon said. "They were saying, 'Hey, great game; hey, great this; and hey, great that.' I was a little bit

Morgan joins Pirates as regional scout

BILL LANG
Contributing Writer

K-State baseball coach Mike Clark has got to be feeling like Old Mother Hubbard.

At the end of the summer, Clark found himself short six players because of the major-league draft and free-agent signings.

His lone assistant coach is headed along a similar path.

Phil Morgan, Clark's top assistant coach for the past three seasons, announced last week that he has accepted a job with the National League East champion Pittsburgh Pirates as director of their regional scouting services.

Morgan said his duties will require more traveling, but the opportunity to do something with major league baseball was an opportunity of a lifetime.

"Professional baseball is on an upswing, and the opportunity to work for one of the top professional organizations doesn't come along very often," Morgan said.

Morgan said he will miss the daily grind of working with the players and teaching baseball skills.

Despite losing Morgan, Clark also has the talent of several players to fill in on the diamond.

"We've lost a lot of good players after this past spring and summer," Clark said.

In addition to Morgan, Clark must find replacements for Chris Hmielewski, who signed with the Montreal Expos, Brad Rippelmeyer (Atlanta Braves), Van Torian (Atlanta Braves), Scott Stroth (San Francisco Giants) and graduates Kent Hipp and Dave Christensen.

"Well, we've got to find somebody, and we've got enough returning people that we should be able to do that," Clark said.

The NCAA rules implemented this fall require teams to limit practice time to 20 hours. If a spring-season team plays any games during the fall, they will count against its regular-season total.

"It's a little difficult at times just playing against your teammates," Clark said. "But this will give us a chance to get better physically, to have the skills down and have a good idea of where to start in the spring semester."

OU hunts for offense

Gibbs says Sooners positive after 2 losses

By the Associated Press

NORMAN, Okla. — Gary Gibbs' weekly news conference had a familiar ring to it Tuesday. He found himself talking about trying to come back from a disheartening loss.

A week ago, he rehashed what had happened in a 10-7 loss to Texas and spoke of the importance of the upcoming Colorado game. But the Sooners lost 34-17 to Colorado, and as a result have only an outside shot to win the Big Eight title.

Now they must try to rev the engines again, this time to play KU. Gibbs believes they can do it.

"Our football team is not in the tank," he said. "We're excited about this week's game and the rest of the Big Eight Conference."

"We've got a bunch of competitors and winners and fighters on our football team, and I don't think we'll see a major letdown due to the loss this past week."

The consecutive losses dropped Oklahoma (4-2 overall, 1-1 in the Big Eight) from sixth to 21st in the rankings. In order to avoid a third straight defeat, the Sooners must improve their play once they move deep into scoring territory.

In the Texas game, Oklahoma missed three first-half field goals. Against Colorado, the Sooners fumbled the ball away at the Colorado 15-yard line and failed to score after recovering a fumble at the Buffaloes' 27.

Gibbs said the passing game has struggled in those situations, and that the Sooners may begin relying more on the running game to get the ball into the end zone.

"If you're not getting things done throwing the football down in that area of the field, we need to utilize our fullbacks and tailbacks to a larger degree."

Quarterback Cale Gundy has struggled the past two weeks. He completed 5 of 17 passes against Texas and was only 8 of 22 with two interceptions against Colorado.

"We need to play better, and he will play better," Gibbs said. "It's not all him. A few times we had breakdowns at the receiver position, we probably didn't have the best play called a few times. We've just got to improve our red zone offense."

And the defense needs to play better. Gibbs said the defense "took a step backward" against Colorado af-

Twins 5-4

Lemke's hit in 12th gives Braves win

By the Associated Press

ATLANTA — Mark Lemke's two-out RBI single in the bottom of the 12th inning ended the Atlanta Braves' long wait for a clutch hit and longest World Series game in 14 years.

Lemke's opposite-field looper to left off Rick Aguilera, the Twins' seventh pitcher, scored David Justice from second base as the Braves returned home and beat the Minnesota Twins 5-4 Tuesday night to narrow the Series gap to 2-1.

Lemke ended an evening in which a record 42 players took part, including the first pinch-hitting appearance by a pitcher since 1965, and provided Atlanta with its first World Series victory ever.

The Braves had not won in the Series when in Milwaukee since 1958, while Minnesota fell to 0-7 overall on the road.

An error by Lemke at second base put the Twins in position to go ahead in the top of the 12th. But Minnesota had only pitchers left, so Aguilera was summoned from the bullpen to hit for reliever Mark Guthrie with the bases loaded and two out.

Aguilera lined out to center field, and then the Braves won in the bottom half when Justice singled with one out, stole second and, after a walk to Greg Olson, scored when Lemke singled on a 1-1 pitch.

Dan Gladden charged Lemke's hit, but his throw bounced wide as Justice slid in.

Aguilera had saved the first two games, and Twins relievers had not allowed an earned run in 32 2-3 consecutive postseason innings dating back to the 1987 World Series against St. Louis.

"That's gotta be the biggest hit of my career," Lemke said.

Certainly, it was the biggest hit of the Series for the Braves, who had left 13 runners on base in the first two games and stranded seven more in scoring position in Game 3.

The Twins wasted their chances, too, leaving two runners on base in the 10th and watching Kent Hrbek strike out with runners on second and third and one out in the 12th. After Hrbek fanned, Kirby Puckett was intentionally walked before Jim Clancy retired Aguilera, who was batting for the first time since 1989 and was the first pitcher to pinch-hit in a Series since Don Drysdale for the Los Angeles Dodgers in 1965.

For a long time, it didn't look like the Braves would need much to win. National League playoff MVP Steve Avery retired 15 of the first 16 batters before tiring and the Braves took a 4-1 lead before a solo homer by Puckett in the seventh inning and a two-run shot in the eighth by designated hitter-turned-pinch hitter Chili Davis off Alejandro Pena tied it.

The game was the longest in the World Series since the New York Yankees beat the Los Angeles Dodgers 4-3 in 12 innings in Game 1 of 1977.

Students give plasma for money

Up to $110 per month can be earned through donations

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Some K-State students are earning extra spending money by donating plasma.

Kurt Mortensen, manager of the Manhattan Donor Center, said about 25-35 percent of the center's donor population is students.

"That's one of the attractions that brought us to Manhattan — the K-State students," Mortensen said, "because, generally, you would like to think that college students are healthy donors."

Mortensen said during the school year the center usually takes 600-900 plasma donations a week.

He attributed the large student turnout to the fact that the center pays each donor for the plasma.

Rebecca Kingsley, freshman in biology, said she donated for the money as well as philanthropy.

"The real reason is to make some extra money," she said, "But it also helps the hemophiliacs, so I know it's for a good cause."

The Manhattan Donor Center, a branch of North American Biologicals Inc., pays donors so it can collect more plasma, Mortensen said.

A new donor or anyone who has not been in for two months will earn $15 on the first and second donations in the same week.

After that, the donor receives $10 each time. On the fifth or sixth donation the donor will get a $10 to $20 bonus.

"A donor can earn up to $80, $100 or $110 a month," Mortensen said.

Computer-based program unites art, technology

K-State one of eight in nation offering degree

KELLY LEVI
Collegian Reporter

The Department of Art is one of eight programs in the nation to offer a master of fine arts degree in graphic design and visual communications.

This is one of the only computer-based programs in the country, said David Harnes, associate professor of art. Harnes and Robert Hower, associate professor of art, are directing the program that began this semester.

"The unity of art and technology is something happening right now," said Kim Logan, graduate student in fine arts and one of four students in the program. "We're coming on to a new technological age where anyone well-versed in computers can manipulate any image."

Harnes said, "News of the program started traveling by word of mouth. Before the publicity material was out, we started hearing from interested people."

The department had one applicant from China and several from India and the United States for the 60-hour program that is a terminal degree, the highest available for art students, Harnes said.

He said he was pleased the art department faculty supported the new program by choosing four graduate students to study graphic design.

Planning began when art faculty took notice of the large numbers of undergraduate students enrolling in graphic design. Hower was hired to implement the program last fall.

"The students are going to have an impact on what you'll see in television and print," Hower said. "Graphic design has always been important, but now it's been placed on a higher level. It's considered an art form."

A number of companies who encouraged undergraduate students to pursue master's degrees also helped the department to begin the program.

Harnes said many companies had visited the department to see the new computer lab and review the program. They have expressed interest in helping fund additional computer equipment or offering internships.

A few Kansas City-area companies are waiting for the current students to graduate so they can hire them, Harnes said.

Why we supported the Essential Edge Campaign

In order to meet the nation's future scientific manpower needs, we must ensure that our brightest, most capable students are not excluded from our educational program because of financial limitations. In addition, our faculty and students must be able to interact with other leaders in the chemical profession.

Our immediate and planned gifts will provide scholarship support to students who wish to enter the chemistry profession, and bring an outstanding chemist or chemical educator to the K-State campus each year for a seminar and informal discussions.

Our contribution is a token of our appreciation for the excellent educational and professional opportunities that Kansas State University has provided to our family and of our support of the University's quest for excellence.

The Essential Edge Campaign is an important opportunity for alumni, faculty and friends to demonstrate their support of Kansas State University and this cause.

World relations need flexibility

Communications vital to economy, executive says

JAYME WALL
Collegian Reporter

It takes flexibility and an open mind to be successful in a global economy, said Edward Whitacre, chairman and chief executive officer of Southwestern Bell Corp.

Whitacre was the speaker Tuesday at the College of Business Administration Distinguished Lecture in Union Forum Hall.

Whitacre said conducting business in a global economy can be exciting, confusing and exhausting.

In making his point, he described situations encountered by Southwestern Bell in doing business abroad. Some examples he shared were attending a company picnic in Israel surrounded by armed guards and receiving a $1,400 parking ticket in Tokyo while making a sales call.

"The single most important lesson for doing business in a global economy is, 'Our way is not the only way,'" he said.

The growth of worldwide communications is probably the single most important factor in the growth of a global economy, Whitacre said.

He said he believes global communication is one of the reasons why American businesses are choosing to go abroad.

"The decision to invest in a foreign country often depends on how easy it is to communicate with overseas offices from home," Whitacre said.

Twenty years ago, there was no nation in the world that could be dialed directly from the United States.

Today, Americans can contact 177 countries by using direct dialing.

Companies are beginning to participate abroad because foreign countries offer greater potential profit, Whitacre said.

Since 1989, the profits earned by American businesses in America have declined 21 percent.

In that same period, profits earned by Americans in overseas business has increased by 15 percent.

"It's easy to see why foreign investments are appealing," he said.

Southwestern Bell's largest venture into foreign investment is in Mexico, Whitacre said.

Southwestern Bell gained controlling interest in TeleMex, a Mexican telephone company, last year.

"It is our intention to develop TeleMex into a strong foundation for Mexico's growth," Whitacre said.

Whitacre said he sees potential for TeleMex to grow much larger than Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. over the next decade.

Whitacre began his career with Southwestern Bell Telephone Co. in 1963 as a student engineer in Dallas, Texas.

He served as president of Southwestern Bell Telephone Co.'s Kansas Division from 1983 to 1984.

Whitacre was named president and chief operating officer in October 1988.

Video business soars

Misdemeanor theft can result from unreturned movies

CRAIG KREUTZER
Collegian Reporter

Not paying late fees on an overdue video may not amount to much for the renter, but for the owner, late fees can add up.

Unpaid late fees are a major problem for video stores, Cinemagic Video manager Kim Franz said.

VIDEO

"Losses from late fees not paid add up to $700 to $1,000 per month for one store alone," Franz said.

In addition to losses from late fees, Franz said, she loses money when people decide to keep the videos.

Franz said she has lost about 25 videos so far this year because people have decided to keep them.

This problem might be because of a misconception about what the videos really cost, she said. Even with the discount the studio offers rental stores, she said, the tapes are still expensive.

"People think the tapes cost me $20, but they don't," Franz said. "At the minimum, they cost me from $72 to $92 per video."

Franz said delinquent late fees and stolen tapes are a problem for both the stores and the customers.

"If it weren't for the people who decide not to pay late fees or just not return videos at all, video rental prices across the United States would be $1.50," she said.

The rental price has to account for some of the lost revenue stores experience due to late tapes and theft, Franz said.

There is, she said, a channel by which video stores can get their tapes back.

The first step starts when a video is two days late. Franz said she calls the customer, reminds him the video is late and should be returned to prevent any additional late fees.

If the customer fails to bring the tape back, Franz calls again. She continues to call each day for 10 days.

After this 10-day grace period, a certified letter is delivered through the mail. The letter states that the customer has a late video and has seven days to return it.

After seven days, the store files a complaint for misdemeanor theft with the Riley County Police Department.

Capt. Allen Raynor said the police will locate the customer and inform him the video needs to be returned before he is brought up on charges from the county attorney.

"Most of the time, they forget they haven't returned it, or they figured a friend took it back," Raynor said.

If the customer still does not return the video, the county attorney sends a letter requesting the video's return.

"The letters have a very salutary effect, and they will get busy and return the tapes," Riley County Attorney Bill Kennedy said.

Franz said the best case scenario is when the customer returns the video after she makes the first telephone call.

"We realize people will sometimes forget that the video is due," she said.

Friday, Saturday nights busiest for local rental stores

Although many students spend their Friday and Saturday nights in Aggieville, the video rental stores in Manhattan have seen business skyrocket.

"About 80 percent of our business is video rentals," said Sharon Johns, co-owner of John's Ice Cream and Video.

VIDEO

The store has about 4,000 tapes for rent, most of which are new releases. New releases are $2.99 per day, and all others are $2.49.

John's Ice Cream and Video was originally a video store when it opened in 1983. In March 1990, however, it began selling ice cream.

The video department at the Westloop Dillon Store has a large number of older movies along with a collection of new movies.

Dillon's charges $2.50 per day for video rentals, but Tuesdays and Wednesdays the cost is only $1.

Movies at Rentway are all rented for two days. New releases cost $2.99, regular movies cost $2.49 and children's movies cost $1.

"We have the biggest video library in town — 10,000 video selections ranging from family to adult movies," said John McDiffett, Rentway assistant manager.

New movies at Cinemagic cost $3 per day to rent, while all others are $2 per day.

"We have a large inventory of older movies," said Mike Borgmeyer, Cinemagic employee.

Corey Williams, night manager at Blue Hills Dutch Maid Supermarket, said most of his store's video business comes from Manhattan citizens rather than students.

The cost of renting movies at Dutch Maid is 99 cents Monday through Wednesday, Thursday through Sunday, new releases are $2.99 per day, and regular movies cost $2.50.

Manhattan video store owners agreed Friday and Saturday are their busiest nights.

City's collection ranges from classical to classics, horrifying to humorous

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

With 800 titles, from Shakespeare to the Three Stooges, the Manhattan Public Library's video collection has something for everyone.

Rosalie Pettit, head of collection development, said Disney and current Academy Award-winning dramas are the most popular, but the collection contains many documentaries and other educational videos that are also in demand.

VIDEO

The acclaimed PBS series, "The Civil War," was added recently, Pettit said.

The collection originated in 1987 when the John D. and Catherine T. MacArthur Foundation offered several PBS series to public libraries that could come up with matching funds.

Manhattan residents supported the project, and the core collection was established, including PBS's "Nova," "I, Claudius," "The Brain" and "The Shakespearean Plays."

Since then, Pettit has added videos covering a wide range of interests, from opera to auto repair.

In the feature film category, old movies are popular, and many are checked out nearly all the time, Pettit said. Legendary performances by film stars like Charlie Chaplin, Greta Garbo and Humphrey Bogart are included.

Pettit said the works of other actors such as Bing Crosby and Bob Hope — starring in what are not necessarily considered great films — were included because they characterize an era.

For those whose tastes run more toward the bizarre, there are horror classics like "Dracula" starring Bela Lugosi and "The Night of the Living Dead" and science-fiction heavy-sciences and industry, said getting paid didn't feel right at first.

"When I first came, I felt guilty for taking the money because I was taught that donating meant free," he said. "But I don't feel guilty anymore because the nurse assured me it was fine."

Donors need two forms of identification and must be able to pass a physical examination before they donate.

Mortensen said donating plasma is much like donating blood. A machine separates the plasma from the blood, collects the plasma and sends the red blood cells back to the body through the same needle.

"Once (the donor) is hooked up to the machine, it takes anywhere from 30 to 45 minutes," Mortensen said.

The amount taken from each donor depends on his or her body weight.

For example, a person who weighs 110 pounds or more will have 820 milliliters taken.

Donating plasma involves no risks, Mortensen said, and the most that will happen is the arm will be bruised.

Playboy picks Big Eight

Three or four K-Staters to appear in April edition of magazine with others from conference

JENNIFER RICHARDS
Collegian Reporter

There's more than great basketball teams and wheat fields here in north-east Kansas, or so thinks Playboy magazine.

A "Girls of the Big Eight" pictorial is scheduled to run in Playboy's April 1992 issue.

Three or four women will be chosen to represent K-State. The women will be paid a modeling fee, interviewed by the media and featured at autograph sessions in addition to appearing in Playboy.

Veteran Playboy photographer David Chan will interview candidates from the Big Eight through December. He will interview Manhattan applicants Oct. 28-30 at the Manhattan Holiday Inn and Holidome.

"We decided it's time to show the world that the Big Eight has something else to offer other than its terrific basketball teams," said Jeff Cohen, Playboy's managing photo editor.

Playboy said the collegiate features are always very popular. Elizabeth Norris, Playboy spokeswoman, said the April issue of Playboy will complement the Big Eight Conference during the basketball season.

Norris said the women do not have to be any certain height or weight, though they are looking for well-proportioned women with a "fresh look".

Applicants must be 18 years old and enrolled full- or part-time in a Big Eight university.

The interviews are scheduled to last 15 minutes and will include questions about the women's interests and hobbies, as well as what type of photos they would prefer.

"Of course, we are always looking for nude photos, but the women will

Applicants were asked to mail photos of themselves, including one swimsuit pose.

Playboy has been photographing students from athletic conferences since 1977. The Big Eight was last featured in the September 1982 issue. The October 1991 issue of Playboy includes a pictorial of the Big Ten.

Campus radio station takes home five awards

KSDB-FM wins in annual statewide competition

HEATHER SMITH
Collegian Reporter

KSDB-FM 92, the campus radio station, recently won five awards in the Kansas Association of Broadcasters' annual competition.

The station competed in the non-commercial education category, which is open to all non-profit radio stations. In many cases, this meant going up against a professional station.

Station Manager Joe Montgomery said he hoped the awards would help the student disc jockeys in their job searches.

"A student station doesn't carry much weight on a resume," Montgomery said.

However, winning awards against professional stations gives KSDB more prestige, he said.

The awards came in five categories: public service announcement, DJ personality, promotion announcement, complete sportscast and play-by-play sportscast.

Troy Coverdale, sophomore in journalism and mass communications, won two awards. Coverdale placed first in the public service announcement category for "Tax Night" and first in DJ personality for the "Breakfast Club."

Montgomery received first place in the promotion announcement for "Cat Jam '90."

Tim Beymer, senior in journalism and mass communications, won first place for a complete sportscast with "92 Sports."

In the play-by-play category, Jeff Grantham, senior in radio-television, placed first for "MHS Football."

K-Rock rolls to high ratings

New format, more power leads to successful 1st year

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

One year ago today, K-Rock began its steady rise to become one of northeast Kansas' most popular radio stations.

KMKF-FM 101.5 changed its format from contemporary hit radio to album-oriented rock last year.

Format is not the only thing K-Rock has changed. The station increased its wattage from 3,000 to 50,000, moved its frequency from 101.7 to 101.5 and changed several disc jockeys, as well as the program director.

The only thing that hasn't changed is the ownership.

"When I came to Manhattan last year to interview for the job of program director, I came about five hours early and just parked my car in a Shop Quik parking lot and listened to local radio stations," said Jason Wright, program director. "I couldn't believe a college town didn't have a rock-oriented radio station."

During the interview, Wright was asked what he would do differently if hired as program director. Wright said he would scrap the current format and change to an album-oriented rock format.

At the time, K-Rock had been considering such a change, and Wright was hired.

"I really didn't expect it to take off this quickly," Wright said. "The Birch Radio ratings through August listed us No. 1 in the adults age 18 through 34 bracket in all time slots in Topeka."

Music Director Steve Anthony said, "We're very good to our public. We play peoples' requests. We interact with our public as much as we can—that's why people like us."

But Anthony and Wright both admit to more concrete reasons.

"This whole area was like one big pie, and there was one-third of it just sitting there for the taking," Anthony said. "There was no rock station in this area."

"When we first started, we were getting calls from Nebraska and Salina and other small towns in the area thanking us for going on the air. It was like they had nothing but Top 40, and it was take it or leave it."

Increased ratings were only one of Wright's goals when he came to K-Rock. Greater community involvement and bringing new music to Manhattan were also high on his list.

"We try to get as involved as we can with the Manhattan community, especially with K-State," Wright said. "We're very happy with the way organizations have asked us to help them with their promotions."

K-Rock offers free advertising time and promotion to all organizations it serves.

Wright said he has also made an effort to attract new music to Manhattan. K-Rock has an all-request format at night and a program called "New Music at Nine," which presents music from local and regional bands.

K-Rock's quick success makes people wonder why no one tried it sooner.

Anthony said, "Well, the Kat (KSKT-FM 95.3) was still around, and they were kind of rock-oriented, and we only had 3,000 watts. When we got the OK to bring up our power to 50,000 watts, that really gave us the opportunity."

In choosing films, Pettie relies on reviews and the recommendations of local experts. But she said she tries to stick to award winners and not duplicate video store titles.

Pettie said she judges films based on artistic merit rather than the ratings assigned by the Motion Picture Association of America Inc.

"We do review all of them. But being librarians, we think people can choose their own material," Pettie said.

Consequently, the collection contains some rather sophisticated movies, many of which are foreign films.

Mark Winokur, assistant professor of English and film scholar, said the public library's collection is better than the University's, which contains just more than 100 films.

Winokur said he was impressed by the library's collection, particularly the number of classic foreign films. He said he was surprised to see "Ivan the Terrible" and "Battleship Potemkin" by Soviet director Sergei Eisenstein and Werner Herzog's "Fitzcarraldo."

"I was really surprised, when I first looked at the collection, to see how good some of the selections were," Winokur said. "There are representative titles in just about every important category, except for experimental or avant-garde film."

Winokur said he understood this omission because of the public library's target audience and limited budget.

"I think they do absolutely the best they can do with the money they've got," Winokur said.

Pettie said she receives about $6,000 a year and adds between 12 and 15 new titles each month. She waits until videos are affordable, partly because of the replacement cost to the patron. Most cost between $20 and $30.

Pettie said she rarely spends $100, but she might for the current Academy Award winner.

She said she would love to add the "Rocky Horror Picture Show" because it is a fun picture, but it's still too expensive for her.

Videos rent for $1 for three days and may be checked out by any Manhattan Public Library cardholder. To get a card, a picture identification and a verification of a local address are required. Overdue fines are $3 per day.

Intramurals more popular

Women, greeks contribute to high turnout at complex

By the Collegian Staff

Intramural participation has had a 20-25 percent increase this semester.

"K-State has an extremely high interest in intramurals compared to other universities," said Steve Martini, associate director of recreational services. "There is a large number of students who participate in intramurals for the number of students attending the University." Martini said K-State has a larger number of women participating in intramurals than most schools, as well as a large number of co-ed teams.

"There is a good mixture of off-campus, residence hall and greek participation," Martini said. "The greek participation is really good."

There are 24 fraternity divisions, with one team representing each house. The other members of the house make up individual teams. One house alone can have four or five teams, he said.

Martini said greeks participate in the point system. He said this competitiveness helps boost interest in intramurals.

This year, 181 teams participated in flag football. This is an increase from the 150 teams that participated last year.

"The increase in participation was completely unexpected," Martini said. "This is the first year we had to schedule more games on Sundays to fit all the teams in."

Steal

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 8 "so we try to give them the opportunity to return the video and take care of the late fees."

But Franz said that even though the tape is returned, it may not always end the problem.

"Most of the time, they'll bring the videos back and just drop them off without paying the late fees," she said.

"And then they won't come back and rent from us so they won't have to pay for the late fees."

Franz said if the customer is a student, she usually gets good results by calling the student's parents.

"I find the parents are more effective than the police because they will call and tell their son or daughter they need to take the tape back or else," Franz said.

Between the police and the student's parents, Franz said, about 95 percent of all overdue tapes are eventually returned to the store.

"People just need to realize what can happen to them if they don't return the tapes," Franz said.

Most people, she said, don't place much importance on paying late fees.

"Most people don't think that late fees are that big of a deal, but when you add up all of the late fees, it really starts to add up as losses for us."

Fire

KTVU reporter Rob Roth and cameraman Nick Soares witnessed the rekindling while they were following up on Saturday's fire.

"A group of firefighters were working on a hot spot and it was smoky but it didn't look like anything to be too concerned about," Roth said. "Then the winds just started to kick in and it was as if they were just dropping gasoline from the sky."

Oakland Fire Chief Phillip Lamont Ewell said, "normal operating procedures" was followed in keeping the firefighters on the scene of Saturday's five-alarm blaze in the hills above Oakland for most of the night.

High temperatures, stiff wind and five years of drought that had turned vegetation to kindling had created "red flag" weather conditions.

Ewell said there were no flareups overnight and when winds stoked the old blaze at about 11 a.m. Sunday there was simply no stopping it as it leapt and howled down the hills above Oakland and Berkeley, devouring the upscale neighborhoods lining the tucks and folds of the slopes.

"Everybody was waiting and watching even to the point where the department's senior staff were inquiring, 'Have they called us yet?'" said Capt. Dave Moore of the San Jose Fire Department, which was asked to send special fire strike teams at about 3 p.m. Sunday.

Oakland asked the California Department of Forestry for a helicopter at about 11:30 a.m. An airtanker was requested an hour later, said CDF spokeswoman Lisa Boyd. More airtankers were sought throughout the afternoon.

State Office of Emergency Service records show a call for mutual aid going out from local agencies at 1 p.m., said Emergency Service spokeswoman Cindy Kawano.

"When you look at a situation from afar it's easy to second-guess what should have been done," said Oakland Fire Lt. Mark Garcia.

Drought

Feldt said, "I don't see any significant relief in the near future in terms of precipitation. But right now, we are past the point of one or two good rains solving the problem."

"Everything is so far depleted that it is going to take rain over several seasons in combination with pretty good snowfall during the winter season."

The drought has affected the state in differing degrees.

"A couple of months ago, the south and southeast were the worst off," Feldt said. "Recently, northeast Kansas has had it the worst. Right now, it looks as if the whole of central and eastern Kansas, along with the southwest, will be in extreme drought."

Mostly because of luck, the northwest portion of the state is not in a drought.

"They've just had better luck," Feldt said. "There is no pattern that indicates why that is, but it just is."

In the meantime, the state has been experiencing unseasonably warm temperatures, which Feldt said is not unusual for this time of year.

"We're still stuck in the transition between summer and fall," Feldt said. "We've had below-normal fall precipitation and above-normal temperatures. But that should be coming to the end by late October, and we should get much more into a fall weather pattern."

THE NAVIGATOR: AN ODYSSEY ACROSS TIME (NEW ZEALAND) (KAL)
In the small, remote mining village of Cumbria, England in the 14th Century, it is the year of the Black Death. Coroner, a local miner, returns from his travels in a state of despair, telling of the horrors of the approaching plague. Griffin, his new-year-old brother, reveals he has been haunted by fragments of dreams alternating between prophetic visions and nightmares. In these dreams lie the only hope of survival for the isolated community. Unrated (92 min.)

SHIPS OF GLASS

BRIAN W. KRATZER/Staff

Senior-master glassblower Mitsugi Ohno, associate instructor in chemistry, melts a rod of glass as he creates a sail for the Santa Maria (foreground) Wednesday afternoon in his studio in the Chemistry/Biochemistry Building.

Ohno is creating all three of Christopher Columbus's ships in glass for the 500th anniversary of the discovery of the Americas, and plans to donate them and several other pieces he has created to the proposed K-State art museum. Several pieces of his work are on display on the third floor of the K-State Union.

Ohno learned to sculpt in glass when he was 13 from his uncle in his native country of Japan.

Forecast predicts Kansas to have warmer winter

Meteorologists expect below average precipitation

HEATHER SMITH
Collegian Reporter

Don't count on walking in a winter wonderland this year. The weather for most of Kansas is expected to be warmer than usual this season.

DROUGHT

Ed O'Lenic of the National Climatic Analysis Center said that there is 55-percent chance of above normal temperatures in December. Kansas should have a modest amount of precipitation with the forecast of a low 50 percent.

The center compares weather probability to 50 percent. That is supposed to be the neutral ground where anything could happen. The higher the percentage deviates from 50 percent, the more accurate the forecast will be, said O'Lenic.

Chuck Martin, assistant professor of geography, explained the uncertainty of weather by pointing out almost all the forecast's percentages are very close to the 50 percent neutral ground.

"People always say there is a 60 percent chance," said Martin. "The reason why there is uncertainty in weather is because there is chaos in the atmosphere," he said.

Currently, there is a 55 percent chance of above normal temperatures for Kansas. There is a 60 percent chance of below normal temperatures in the southwest United States, and east of the Mississippi up to the Great Lakes should have a 60 percent chance of being warmer than normal.

Normally, the winter weather temperature is 28 degrees in the Manhattan area accompanied by around 20 inches of snow, according to the Weather Almanac.

O'Lenic said there were two methods the climatic analysis center used to predict the weather. One of the methods is the analog forecasting technique. In this method forecasters try to find a correlation between the current year and the past weather. The center keeps records of the weather dating back to the latter part of the 19th Century.

The second method is a graph. In this technique, forecasters plot out the current temperatures of the season and then compare those temperatures to other seasons. They look for similarities in the graph of the two seasons.

People must consider a long forecast as an average weather pattern, O'Lenic said. For example, on a 90-day forecast there is no way to pinpoint the weather of an exact day two months away.

Martin said that there are indications in certain parts of the atmosphere that will assist in a weather prediction —

DDT cleanup remains a mystery

55-gallon drums removed from ground; responsibility for toxic waste questioned

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

Two 55-gallon drums of the insecticide DDT were removed from a section of land west of Manhattan early this month.

But the clean-up process and the question of whose responsibility it was and to what extent they must go are far from over.

K-State's Department of Forestry purchased the DDT 20 years ago to control an insect infestation in Christmas trees grown on the land.

The unused insecticide was buried in accordance with toxic waste disposal programs in effect at the time.

"Burial of unused farm chemicals was the general practice at the time," Director of Public Safety John Lambert said.

The land was sold in 1975 and bought later by Delbert and Jeanne Stadel, the current owners.

It was not until the late 1970s when the Stadels put a waterway on the land was the DDT rediscovered.

During the waterway construction, the barrels were uncovered, but their location and the laws of the period were such that they were not removed at the time, Stadel said.

The barrels of DDT were buried and forgotten until a year ago when the Stadels and Dennis Matteson, who lives on a portion of the section, called the buried waste to the University's attention.

"We just want it all out so it's safe," Jeanne Stadel said.

No one really remembered the DDT was there. Steve Galitzer, University industrial hygienist, said that at the time it was buried, it was proper procedure, so the entire incident was forgotten about.

Grassland fires continue

Dry weather cited as cause; blazes controlled

By the Collegian Staff

Fires, some being ruled arson-related, erupted throughout the Manhattan vicinity Wednesday.

Two fires occurring in the area south of the K-State campus are being investigated as suspicious by authorities.

A fire at the WildCatSeven apartment building, 1620 Fairchild Ave., causing approximately $1,000 damage to a balcony on the first floor and nearby shrubbery is being called aggravated arson, said Charles Tannehill, Battalion Chief of the Manhattan Fire Department.

The fire department received a call at 8:42 p.m. reporting a possible grass fire at the address. When firefighters arrived at the scene, they discovered the balcony was also burning.

"Some bags of leaves were set on fire and it ignited the balcony," Tannehill said.

Tannehill said he was investigating the fire for a possible link to a similar fire occurring previously.

"That's why we're concerned. We had one 40 minutes to an hour earlier in the same general area," he said. "Basically, the first one was just leaves and caused no damage. This one caused damage to the building that was occupied which makes it aggravated arson."

Numerous other grass fires started in the Manhattan area Wednesday, continuing a recent trend of outbreaks caused by the dry conditions in the region.

Smoke from three fires on Fort Riley land could be seen from Highway K-18 near Ogden and the Manhattan Municipal Airport Wednesday afternoon.

One, located in the extreme northern part of the installation near the town of Riley, was extinguished, said Mark Meseke, media relations director for Fort Riley.

The other two, located just east and south of the artillery impact area, were under control, Meseke said. The impact area is in the northwestern section of the fort.

Meseke said he did not have any information yet regarding the cause of the grass fires or the extent of damage. He said there is a unit training in the area.

"They have been told to reduce or eliminate the use of pyrotechnics, smoke grenades or flares," he said. "A lot of times, they'll put the fire out themselves. If it gets any worse, they'll call the fire department."

The fires could have been caused by anything, even a cooking fire, he said.

With the lack of rain in the area, units are instructed to be cautious with

Israeli, Arab leaders set for conference

Mideast peace conference negotiating teams ready for meeting in Madrid

By the Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria — Hard-line Israeli and Arab leaders solidified their positions Wednesday in preparation for next week's Mideast peace conference. Prime minister Yitzhak Shamir announced he would lead the Israeli negotiating team and Syria sought Arab consensus to block any separate peace accords with the Jewish state.

At a foreign ministers meeting in Damascus, the four Arab participants most directly involved in the talks reportedly agreed not to negotiate separately with Israel until it ceded ground on issues like the occupied territories and Jewish settlement building.

Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir stunned Israeli politicians by announcing that he will head his delegation at the Madrid talks, indicating he wanted to make sure his hard-line views would dominate Israel's positions.

The more dovish foreign minister, David Levy, said he would skip the conference and criticized Shamir for naming his own people to head negotiating teams. Among the men Shamir reportedly was taking to Madrid was deputy foreign minister Benjamin Netanyahu, a political rival of Levy.

The White House announced that all parties had accepted the invitation to the conference, which opens next Wednesday, and urged them to go to Madrid with an open mind. Syria and Lebanon apparently were the last Arab states to accept the Soviet and U.S. invitations to the conference.

"There will be total Arab coordination," said Syrian Foreign Minister Farouk al-Sharaa.

Officials close to the meeting said Syria, Jordan, Lebanon and the Palestine Liberation Organization agreed not to strike any separate peace deal with Israel. The officials spoke on condition of anonymity.

Egypt is attending the peace conference only as an observer and potential mediator.

Wednesday's planning session by Arab states in Damascus was dominated by a U.S. proposal for most Arab states to participate in broad regional talks with Israel immediately after the ceremonial opening of the conference, the sources close to the meeting said.

The conference is expected to break up into three sets of bilateral talks between Israel and Syria, Israel and Lebanon, and Israel and a joint Jordanian-Palestinian delegation.

Then the other states in the region are supposed to join in discussions on broader issues such as arms control, water and energy. Many Arab states perceive this as a move that would automatically give Israel the status of an equal in the region that has tried to ostracize it.

Syria has already told Secretary of

MIDDLE EAST PEACE CONFERENCE

- The conference will start Wednesday in Madrid, Spain.
- The delegation from Israel will be headed by Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir. Shamir is going himself to make sure his hard-line policies will be kept intact.
- Several Arab states have agreed to not sign any separate peace treaties with Israel.

State James Baker that it opposes convening such a regional conference until Israel's intentions are made clearer.

Syrian President Hafez Assad and PLO Chairman Yasser Arafat agreed last week that Jewish settlement building, the status of Jerusalem and U.N. resolutions calling for Israeli withdrawal from occupied territories should be discussed at an initial session.

Conference sources said Damascus wanted to make acceptance of group talks dependent on Israel's stance on these three issues.

As Israel's last formidable foe, Syria has a pivotal role on the Arab side.

It rejected an Israeli suggestion that the bilateral negotiations be held in the Middle East.

Wheat varieties researched

K-State, USDA test insect, disease resistant crops

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

K-State researchers and the United States Department of Agriculture are experimenting with developing new varieties of wheat that will be more resistant to diseases and insects.

"We are redoing what Mother Nature did 15,000 years ago," said Stan Cox, research geneticist with the USDA and associate professor in agronomy. "There was a natural cross between durum, or spaghetti wheat, and goat grass. Pollen from goat grass combined with the durum and that's where our bread wheat comes from."

Cox's research is mainly concerned with developing germplasm, which is a parental line that is combined with wheat to make crosses and produce other wheat varieties.

One of the lines of germplasm is the Amigo line. This line was developed by the USDA and Oklahoma State University. Part of this line comes from half a chromosome of wheat, called 1A, and the other part is from half a chromosome of rye, called 1R. Resistance to wheat curl mite and green bugs and a tolerance for stem rust and powdery mildew was brought to the wheat by the Amigo line.

At least three varieties of wheat have the Amigo 1AIR line bred into them. These include TAM 107, TAM 200 and Century.

Agronomy Professor Rollin Sears said the variety TAM 107 "is more winter hardy and better for Kansas than the TAM 200 variety. The Century variety was not well accepted by farmers because a gene for leaf rust resistance broke down."

USDA and K-State developed the Hamlet variety of germplasm. It got its name from the translocation 2B2R. "The first part is 2B as in to be or not to be," said Cox.

This line protects wheat from the Hessian fly. "These flies live only on wheat. In the fall, they lay their eggs on the wheat," Cox said. "When the eggs hatch, the larvae crawl down to

DDT

■ DDT was first introduced during World War II to control lice, malaria and other front-line diseases.

■ More recently, the chemical has commonly been used as a pesticide. It was useful for this purpose because it stays effective for long periods of time.

■ Although DDT is not very toxic to humans, it causes mutations and egg-shell thinning in birds. For this reason, it was taken off the market.

Operation Turkey underway

Operation Turkey is underway. The Order of Omega is having a greek food drive for needy families this week.

Darius Lechtenberger, Order of Omega president, said there were eight sororities and seven fraternities participating in the food drive.

Monday was Miss-a-Meal night, in which chapters gave up a meal and the money that would have been used to prepare the meals was donated to the Mayor's Holiday Tree program.

So far, $1,600 has been collected for the program, which will help buy turkeys for Christmas dinners, Lechtenberger said.

Unrequited love: Kong still without Fay

KANSAS CITY, Mo. (AP) — Anonymous bandits returned a 40-foot-tall inflatable King Kong that was stolen from atop a Halloween haunted house, but the gorilla's inflatable woman is still missing.

A 5-foot-tall latex Fay Wray was not returned with the deflated Kong Tuesday night, said police spokesman Sgt. Greg Mills.

"Sort of makes you wonder who has Fay Wray and what are they doing with her," Mills said.

Detective Robert Hartman said both were taken before dawn Tuesday from the Devil's Darkside Haunted House. The gorilla reappeared in an off-duty officer's pickup truck parked behind another haunted house, where he was working.

Police suspect the theft was a

He also said the greek houses will go door to door collecting food through Thursday. Fraternities and sororities will team up and collect cans as part of a competition.

After the collection, the cans will be weighed and the winning team will be presented a plaque.

"It's gone pretty good so far," Lechtenberger said. "It gives us a chance to help those less fortunate."

Shelly Goddard, philanthropy chairperson for Chi Omega, agreed.

"The fact that it goes to needy families in Manhattan makes it worth while," Goddard said.

Dole said the story reported "something Kansans have known for a long time — that our state is a great place to visit, especially if you want to see frontier history up close and personal, and if you're eager to meet friendly folks wherever you go."

He continued, "In short, what awaits visitors to Kansas is the real thing, not the 'Frontier World' of some artificial theme park, and certainly not the Hollywood Kansas of 'The Wizard of Oz.'"

N.Y. woman mistaken for deer critical

TARRYTOWN, N.Y. (AP) — A man who routinely took target practice in the wooded area behind his house mistook his mother for a deer when he shot her while she was pruning a tree, police said Wednesday.

Takeko Hose, 47, was reported in critical condition at Phelps Memorial Hospital.

Her son, David Joseph Isamu Hose, 19, fired two shots from a .22-caliber rifle into her chest Tuesday evening, said police Lt. Andrew Kelleher of Greenburgh. Tarrytown, a New York City suburb on the Hudson River, is in Greenburgh.

Kelleher said it is illegal to fire a weapon in the neighborhood, but an investigation showed that Hose routinely took target practice or shot at game in the woods behind his house. Police said an investigation was continuing.

One year elapsed from the time K-State was first contacted about the buried waste until its removal.

Because each case of toxic waste is unique, Galitzer said, there is not a particular set of procedures to follow.

He said before the barrels of insecticide could be removed, they first had to be located.

"We knew the general area where the barrels were, but not their exact location," Jeanne Stadel said.

Galitzer said the chemical being buried in barrels made locating it easier.

The barrels also helped control the amount of soil that was contaminated, he said.

"A lot of chemicals just come in paper bags, and the amount of soil contaminated would have been much greater had this been the case," Galitzer said.

"As it is, the contamination didn't spread very far."

Dorothy Thompson, associate

University attorney, said there was never any determination of whose responsibility it was to get it removed.

John Lambert, director of public safety, said, "We put it there, so we took it out."

Although the barrels of insecticide and the equivalent of four or five barrels of contaminated soil have been removed, the project is not complete.

The chemical DDT was considered an all-purpose chemical at its introduction during World War II. The army used it to control lice, malaria and other diseases local to battle front climates.

In all cases, the chemical was effective. Once used at a treatment, the chemical was effective for long periods of time.

"Its strong point was also its weak point. It lasted a long time — that's good for killing off insects, but bad because of the long biological half-life," Galitzer said.

"While DDT has a low toxicity in humans, it biodegrades slowly and causes mutations and egg-shell thinning in birds. That was a factor in the decline of eagle populations," he said.

"Since DDT has been banned, eagle populations are on the rise."

These factors were considered, and DDT was pulled from the market.

K-State is now waiting for the state to tell them how much is enough.

"We send our clean-up results to the state. They look at what we've done and tell us, given all the variables, if we need to remove more or not,"

Galitzer said.

Approved disposal of hazardous waste no longer includes burying. The insecticide will either be burned or taken to a hazardous waste dump.

"Once we're sure we have all of it, we'll go through getting a contract for disposal. We're probably going to incinerate," Galitzer said.

K-State plumber remembered as friend to all

Anderson died in an automobile accident on Oct. 18

CAMBI COLLEY
Collegian Reporter

Andrew "Ted" Anderson cared about the students and faculty of K-State just as he cared for those people whose lives he touched as a volunteer firefighter in Frankfort.

Anderson, 58, was killed Oct. 18 in an automobile accident on K-13, about six miles north of U.S. 24.

He was driving northbound when he crossed the center line and collided with a southbound truck driven by Kristi Robel, sophomore in arts and sciences.

Anderson was a plumber with facilities maintenance at K-State for the last 15 years.

Ray Sharp, plumbing maintenance supervisor for facilities, said Anderson was dedicated to his work and was always courteous.

"He didn't have a non-friend on campus," Sharp said. "He knew where everything was on campus."

Anderson served the Frankfort fire department as a volunteer firefighter for 20 years and became an honorary member in 1985. He was also a Cub Scout leader. His widow, Shirley, said he also supported campus activities.

"We have gone to football games together for the past 15 years," she said. "We sat in the same seats each year."

When he wasn't found at a football game or at work, Anderson was enjoying his many hobbies. He liked to build and work with electrical systems, played the piano by ear and helped coach baseball in Frankfort. He was also an active member of the Moose Club in Marysville, where he and his wife went to dances.

"Ted was a guy everyone liked and respected. He was very good at what he does and just a nice guy."

Hank Cisk

Hank Cisk, a lifetime friend of Anderson's from Frankfort, ran a garage and filling station across the street from Anderson's plumbing shop. Anderson owned the shop for six years before coming to K-State.

"Ted was a guy everyone liked and respected," Cisk said. "He was very good at what he does and just a nice guy."

Anderson was born March 21, 1933, in Frankfort, where he also graduated from high school in 1950. He married Shirley Johnson in 1954.

Anderson is survived by his wife; two sons, David of Enterprise and Duane of Frankfort; one daughter, Denise Fritz of Frankfort; one sister, Delores Bolding of Manhattan; one brother, John Anderson of Lawrence; and nine grandchildren.

Former KKK leader racks up support

Louisianian David Duke secured nearly 500,000 votes in gubernatorial race

By the Associated Press

METAIRIE, La. — Why did nearly half a million Louisianians vote for David Duke, putting the former Ku Klux Klan leader one step away from the governor's office?

For some, his white supremacist history is an asset. For others, it's his promises — or what they believe he's promising: everything from reviving a long-struggling state economy to filling potholes.

ANALYSIS

For most, however, Duke seems to be simply the candidate of the fed up.

Carolyn Fields, a $16,000-a-year office worker in suburban New Orleans, said two-thirds of her earnings go to taxes and insurance payments.

"I'm not even middle class; I'm poor," she said. "I have to live off one-third, and that's what I'm fed up with."

Brady Dugas, 18, who works on sugar cane farms in his native Cajun country in southern Louisiana, complained, "A lot of people are feeding off the people that work. We're getting tired of that."

Bobby Sullivan, retired at 61 from his own construction business, said of Duke: "He's bringing issues before the people that need to be addressed — welfare reform, taxes. I'm fed up, but I'd like to do something about it."

If David Duke was long dismissed

— as a fringe-party presidential candidate, as founder a decade ago of the National Association for the Advancement of White People, as a Nazi-influenced political caricature — no one is dismissing him anymore.

"He cannot be laughed away, he cannot be denounced away," said Gus Weill, a longtime Louisiana political analyst. "Anyone who thinks he's not for real as a political force is dreaming."

Duke, a Republican disavowed by the White House and the national GOP,

Just giving credit where credit is due

There can be no mistaking the signs that the rest of the nation is beginning to respect K-State.

The debate team's national championship last year was one of the first things that grabbed the nation's attention.

But the University is becoming a Big Eight powerhouse in football, now, too. After a big win against the Jayhawks two weeks ago and a narrow loss to Nebraska last weekend, the program is garnering votes in national polls.

American Gladiators has taken its wildly popular television show on the road and made one of its first stops at Brandeberry Complex last weekend. The show recruited K-Staters to battle Blaze, Nitro and the gang on national TV.

Playboy has taken notice of us and finally realized it had neglected K-State far too long. Photographers from the magazine that was almost banned from Union bookshelves will be here next week, interviewing women for positions as models in the April 1992 issue, which will have a special "Girls of the Big Eight" pictorial.

Our great President Jon Wefald has been quick to accept credit for the debate team, but he's been a little bashful to accept some praise for some of the other great things happening here at K-State. We'd like to rectify that.

Thanks, President Wefald, for helping a debt-ridden football program become nationally recognized. Thanks for helping K-State become one of the nation's top T&A schools. Thank you for getting K-State noticed by people who produce TV shows for viewers who find it hard to follow captions in comic books.

We hope these kinds of events keep happening here at K-State. We hope President Wefald, the Board of Regents and, well, heck, even the Legislature keep up the good work and keep taking notice of the great programs here at K-State. We've done so well with so little.

Peace Middle East conference offers hope for future

Finally, months after Desert Storm, a lasting peace may come to the Middle East.

Israel's vote to attend a peace conference consisting of Middle East countries was a historic step forward for the war-torn region. For centuries, and more specifically since Israel's inception, the answer to a dispute has been violence.

The arguments on which the Middle East countries base their battles have long boggled Western minds — for the wars are not necessarily based on money or oil.

Rather, the battle has been one of faith — of whether Islam or Christianity can lay claim to the holy lands as being theirs.

For more than a millennium, this battle has been fought, but now there is a glimmer of hope. This hope, seen through the Judeo-Christian-Moslem coalition against Saddam Hussein, the release of Western hostages and Israel's willingness to finally sit at the bargaining table, has been a long time coming.

Israel approaches the conference with a great deal of apprehension, pessimistically believing that the outcome of such a meeting can only make things worse.

Instead, let's hope this Western-backed, Mid-East-approved conference yields open minds willing to compromise in the name of peace.

Let's hope Israel is proven wrong. And let's hope the next millennium will not have to survive another Desert Storm.

SHAWN BRUCE

So my co-worker Heather Anderson left a note on my door that said, "Shawn, you should go try out for American Gladiators. It could be really funny."

My first response was to think, "Funny peculiar or funny ha-ha?" But after realizing I was pretty much going to be the butt of the joke no matter what, I decided to do it.

Obviously, my first duty was to find a clever name for myself. Since all the good ones like "Thunder" and "Nitro" were taken, I decided to adopt the moniker "Fog." I figured it summed me up very well: Pretty much harmless, but with an amazing ability to annoy.

So Saturday, the day of testing Gladiator fate, came.

As I walked into the Brandeberry Indoor Sports Complex, I was on guard. The last thing I wanted was "Thunder" hitting me upside the head with a pugil stick before the competition even began.

Luckily, none of the Gladiators were around. In fact, the only person in sight was a small woman, and I was pretty confident I could take her in Powerball.

The legend of FOG

Bruce, a.k.a. Fog, goes through rigorous Gladiator tryouts

However, as it turned out, I found out I wouldn't be competing against her or anybody else. The woman, a Gladiator official, told me I could go ahead and do the events, but I would have to wait until "the serious competitors" were done.

I was slightly hurt by her remarks. Just because I'm 30 pounds overweight (a conservative estimate) and had a cigarette in my mouth while I was talking to her, she had no reason to assume I wasn't there to give it my all.

Feeling like the kid whose always picked last, I took a seat to wait. It was really interesting watching the "serious competitors" size each other up. It seemed that trying to frighten the competitors by flexing and making comments was as much a part of the competition as were the actual events.

As I looked around, I realized the only people in the building who were frightened of me were the EMTs — and that was only because they saw me as a potential heart-attack victim.

Before I knew it, it was my turn to go. With one last puff on my smoke and a meaningful glance at the paramedics, I set off to the first event — the dreaded push-ups. However, these weren't normal push-ups. These were fingertip pushups. And I was supposed to do 55 of them in 60 seconds.

The first 10 came pretty easily. The next five not bad. After that, it was pure hell. I struggled to do 25 of them before I was disqualified for resting. After finding out the women's requirement was 35, I realized what a wreck my body is.

Next up on the Gladiator tryout bill was the 40-yard dash. It actually went OK. Not only was my time of 5.7 seconds under the women's requirement of 6.2 seconds, but the guy who timed me said I was actually faster than some of the people who had been in the competition seriously. Even if he was lying, I appreciated it.

As I headed for the shuttle run — also called "suicides" — I could feel oxygen deprivation setting in. That not only explains my time of 17.4 but also why I failed to find out what the requirements were. People just don't seem to like talking to a gasping and sweating columnist. Just ask Skoog.

The last event was Powerball. The goal was for one competitor to take a soccer ball and attempt to put it in a trash can while the other guy tried to stop him. I was looking forward to this event because, for once, my "spare tire" would come in handy.

I failed to score, but then, I wasn't scored upon either. When you combine that with the fact that I made it through the whole competition without resorting to use of oxygen, I consider my Gladiator experience a small victory.

I'm supposed to have an opinion in these columns, so here it is. We should all immediately get in shape so we can wear those costumes that "Thunder" and "Nitro" prefer.

So, I'm embarking on an ambitious fitness plan that entails proper diet (no more Ho-Ho's), lots of exercise (instead of relying on coughing to burn calories) and promising to take better care of myself in general.

Tomorrow.

Zig Zagging PRIORITIES

Education, family most important

TRACEY GAGE GUEST
Tracey Gage is a sophomore in journalism and mass communications

A tall blond-haired girl came into the gas station where I work the other day and asked if we had any Zig-Zags (cigarette rolling papers). We were out of them. And when I told her so, she looked as if she had just lost her best friend. She may have, I don't know.

The girl went back outside to fill her tank with gas. She had an old junky car. Then a man I knew walked in and started to write a check. Pointing to the girl's car, he said, "I'm going to pay for the gas in that car."

I was really surprised the two were associated, and I said, "Is that your daughter who's been visiting you?"

The man looked at me and said, "No, that's my youngest. She doesn't live at home any more."

After the man said goodbye, he went back outside and got in the girl's car. As they drove away, I saw the girl light up a cigarette. I couldn't help but wonder if the man had also bought the girl's cigarettes.

I'm not sure if the girl has a job, but I know her father has an honest job and works hard at it. He has been recognized in the local paper for his accomplishments. He is a very nice man who always takes a minute to stop and ask how I'm doing.

The girl didn't even care if I was a real person. All she wanted was a pack of Zig-Zags.

This made me wonder what life would be like if my only worry was where I was going to get a pack of rolling papers. I just can't believe the way people set their priorities.

I know that everybody's priorities are a little different, and I'm not one to judge people by them. But, it just makes me wonder about a person's future when her father has to buy her a tank of gas because she's saving her last couple of bucks for a pack of Zig-Zags.

I'm sure the girl's father had no idea why his daughter went in the store. He's not the type of man who would support such habits.

In a way, I feel like I am supporting these bad habits by selling rolling papers in the first place. The tobacco companies put papers in the packages of bulk tobacco they sell, so why should we even sell rolling papers?

We sell cigarettes where I work. Does that mean I'm saying it's OK to smoke and risk getting cancer because somebody's making money off the sale?

Why do we sell products that could cause death? People get hooked on these products and then they can't live without them. I know, I see it every time I work.

What is the world coming to when a person raids his or her child's piggy bank for 174 pennies to buy a pack of cigarettes?

Alcohol is another good example. I see some people buy a 12-pack of beer a day. These are the same people who never have enough money to buy their kids five-cent pieces of gum.

In my mind, I just cannot justify this type of behavior. I don't see how people can be so wrapped up in their own wants they forget or ignore the needs of others.

I'm not saying that everyone who smokes (cigarettes or otherwise) or drinks is wrong for doing so. I'm just saying maybe they should think about what other things they could buy with that money. Like gas for their cars? Or food for their families? Or maybe a good education for their children?

LETTERS

Collegian, band need morals, clothes

Editor,
Regarding the picture of the Roach Factory in the Oct. 18 Collegian, I won't fault the Roach Factory members, they may not know any better. But I would question the journalistic integrity of a publication that would allow the picture to be printed. Perhaps the editors could use a good course in art and morality.

As for the Roach Factory members themselves, since they are a local group, the Manhattan Emergency Shelter would probably furnish them with free clothing. If not, I'll bet any thrift shop in town would give them a discount rate. Or would that be above their dignity?

Who's got the look?

Editor,
After reading the article in the Oct. 10 Collegian, "Frosh denied cheerleader spot," I realized that Scott Johnson is quite a fast talker.

He told Audra Henderson her body was not yet mature. However, he tried to explain this away by saying, "The look affects the dance." How, may I ask? Did poor Audra just not bounce enough?

Apparently not. After all, Johnson did say that if points had been recorded, none of the cheerleaders selected would have been chosen. So "appearance" certainly must have been a key factor in its own right. Had points been used, the effects of "the look" on the dance would have been recorded in each separate category (dance, jumps, kicks, etc.) So why would there be such a discrepancy between the two forms of judging? It's easy: because the contestants were judged on appearance, plain and simple.

So why not add a swimsuit category to the cheerleading tryouts? Or, better yet, how about a wet T-shirt contest? Perhaps all athletes should be judged in a similar fashion — "Well, you are a great kicker, but you just don't have 'the look' of a K-State football player!"

Several years ago, I remember hearing about an anchorwoman who was fired because she was aging, and the producer felt she was no longer attractive enough. He, too, must have thought she was not "someone who catches the eyes of the audience."

She sued the TV station and won an incredible settlement. The station was punished for its sexist practices. Perhaps Scott Johnson should be reprimanded as well.

Wamego home of intellectuals

Editor,
I sometimes enjoy reading Ed Skoog's column, accompanied by his Beaver Cleaver-like picture. But I must take exception to some of the things he said in this last column concerning the trip he took to the wilds of rural Kansas to free his pet chicken, Fajita.

Mr. Skoog, he of pet chicken forgotten live in a kitchenware box, scouring the grocery store floor for change and "playing in the frozen food section," made several disparaging remarks about the looks ("funny") and occupations ("farm wives") of 50 or so of the people he saw in Wamego while waiting to be rescued from a situation into which he had irresponsibly gotten himself, his friend and his chicken.

Those were not funny-looking people. Those were people looking at you funny because Wamego is a town full of sophisticated intellectuals (some of whom are farm wives) who live 15 miles from campus for the prime purpose of avoiding chicken-abusing types like yourself. I'm sure I was one of the 50, and I'm also sure the looks were those of distress that someone of your ilk had found his way to our city.

Nebraska fans' applause sincere

Editor,
It's unfortunate that one of our football players interpreted our applause for the Wildcats after Saturday's game as sarcasm or a show of pity. It was not.

We applaud every team, win or lose, that plays hard and clean. When Washington beat us in the fourth quarter this year, the Huskies were also applauded as they left the field. Pity? Sarcasm? You must be kidding. We consider visiting teams and their fans as our guests, and while we have our share of "fan jerks," the vast majority of our fans try to be gracious hosts.

I wish the Wildcats well and hope they get a bowl bid. It was one hell of a college football game Saturday.

Legalizing pot not waste of time

Editor,
In the Oct. 17 Collegian, John Clement wrote a letter to the editor stating that fighting for the legalization of cannabis is a waste of time. I strongly disagree.

People's lives are being torn apart, not because marijuana is an evil, harmful substance (it isn't), but because of this country's oppressive marijuana laws.

Good, moral people are going to jail and being treated like second-class citizens because they grow, harvest and use cannabis sativa. More than 400,000 U.S. citizens are arrested each year on marijuana charges — 85 percent of these are for simple possession. Their lives are devastated. They can do serious jail time, pay huge fines and lose their jobs.

This is insane. When a certain section of our population loses its rights, we all lose. Every fascist state has its scapegoat. It seems to me that the current administration may be using drug hysteria as an excuse to set up an international police apparatus (remember Panama?).

Finally, I have a response for Bill Arks' letter about marijuana statistics. The first day of General Psychology class, I learned that correlation does not mean causation. The example my professor used was the rehabilitation industry's attempts to link marijuana use to harder drugs.

Although 98 percent of all people who have tried cocaine have used "dope" (Bill's term, not mine), they probably also have used corn flakes. Does this mean corn flakes lead to cocaine use? I doubt it.

Bowl picture cloudy

With the recent play displayed by the K-State football team, visions of bowl games are surely dancing in the heads of many K-State faithful.

The Wildcats' lone bowl appearance came in 1982. That season, K-State defeated Colorado at home 33-10 to lock up a 6-4-1 record and an Independence Bowl bid.

This weekend's battle could be more closely related to that '82 matchup than it appears at first glance.

That is due to a new NCAA rule involving the selection of teams by the bowl committees. The rule states teams must be "deserving" in order to be selected to participate in an NCAA-certified bowl.

No problem, you say. Any team that came within one play of beating the mighty Cornhuskers on their home field is definitely a deserving team. At 4-2, with their only losses on the road at Top-25 opponents, the Cats would seemingly fall into that category right now.

But a problem arises at this point because none of the people who carry the preceding view are responsible for giving out bowl bids.

That's not to say bowls aren't interested in K-State — several are. Representatives from the Independence Bowl and Freedom Bowl have both said they are still very much interested in K-State and will continue to scout in Manhattan this Saturday.

But hands are being tied, and, once again, the NCAA is behind the scenes.

The legal wizards of the all-powerful NCAA define "deserving" as teams with six wins over NCAA Division I-A opponents. Furthermore, it says bowls will not be certified by the NCAA unless both teams are "deserving."

Uh-oh. K-State's first two opponents, Indiana State and Idaho State, are both — you guessed it — Division I-AA teams. Virtual no-counters.

That drops the Cats' record on the deserving scale to 2-2. In addition, it lowers their season schedule to nine games, four of which are against highly-ranked powers Washington, Nebraska, Colorado and Oklahoma.

That's a set of opponents that would give many bowl teams an 0-4 record.

Dissecting the rest of the schedule, a home game with Missouri and road games at Iowa State and Oklahoma State are games K-State should be favored to win. If the Cats do, they would have a total of five countable wins.

That leaves the Cats one win short and two games to play. Those two games are this Saturday's home date with No. 16 Colorado, followed by a road trip to No. 21 Oklahoma. A victory in either of those matchups would be a tall order for anyone, but K-State has recently proved capable of such a challenge.

Just playing both teams tightly wouldn't be considered good enough. If K-State was to tie both games, it would end 7-2-2, and probably tied for second place in the Big Eight with a 4-1-2 record. But it would still fall short of being a "deserving" team in the eyes of the NCAA.

That makes Saturday's game with Colorado even bigger, as it's the one home game that stands between K-State and a bowl. A fired-up crowd might just be the one weapon that could turn a scare into a landmark win for Wildcat football.

Lusnic sets precedent in Riviera

Freshman becomes 1st Wildcat to advance in tournament's main draw

From Staff and Wire Reports

Freshman Karin Lusnic defeated Christine Neumann of Duke to reach the main draw of the Riviera All-American Tennis Championships in Los Angeles.

She became the first player in the program's 14-year history to advance to the main draw.

Lusnic needed three sets to beat Neumann, 6-4, 2-6, 6-3. She will continue play as one of the top 32 competitors in the nation at the championships today. Lusnic's opponent in the main draw will be Mandy Wilson of Tennessee.

"We've never had anyone at Kansas State do anything like this," Wildcat tennis coach Steve Bietau said. "Karin has shown incredible effort."

Lusnic accomplished the feat by winning seven singles matches in five days, advancing through pre-qualifying and qualifying rounds. The Lubijana, Yugoslavia, native also played three doubles matches with partner Mareke Plocher. Lusnic and Plocher were eliminated in the doubles qualifying round, while Plocher was also ousted in the pre-qualifying singles round.

"To prequalify and then qualify really stacks all the odds against you because you're continually getting tired and you are having to compete against better players who are fresh," Bietau said.

Lusnic's road to the main draw was made tougher by opponents from traditionally strong California schools. Her opening-round win came against UNLV's Janelle Barr, who Lusnic defeated 6-3, 7-6. In the second round, Lusnic beat USC's Maggie Simkova 6-3, 6-3.

Lusnic also defeated California's Sara Maynard in the semi-finals 6-3, 3-6, 6-4. She won her first five singles matches in straight sets.

"It's been amazing what she has accomplished," Bietau said. "She's established herself in a short time as one of the best players we've ever had."

"Karin is doing a good job of making the transition to the hard courts. She's coming to the net more and taking pressure off her ground strokes."

Before losing in the pre-qualifying round, Plocher defeated Cal-Irvine's Alli Yoshimoto and USC's Julie Tullberg.

K-State's other two players, Neili Wilcox and Michele Riniker, were defeated in first-round matches. Wilcox lost to Roseann Alva of Cal-State Fullerton 6-4, 6-4. Riniker took

Problems with track force K-State to lose Big 8 meet

BILL LANG

Contributing Writer

Wear and tear on K-State's R.V. Christian Track has forced the move of the 1992 Big Eight Outdoor Track Championships to another conference site.

According to representatives from the Big Eight service bureau, the track has a sinkhole on its north end. K-State track and cross country coach John Capriotti said the damage is a result of constant wear on the surface below the track, which has existed for 20 years.

K-State athletic director Milt Richards said the cost of repairs and the time to make the repairs were not suitable for Big Eight officials, thus K-State had to release the championships to another school.

"We're disappointed that we couldn't be the host for the meet," Richards said. "It's just that the track wasn't up to snuff, and right now we don't have the money in our budget to fix it."

"We need to get it fixed sometime so we can have other meets in the future. We just need to figure out where we're going to come up with money to fix it."

A reason for the release of the championships could be traced back to K-State's $5.4-million debt, which has limited the progress on needed improvements during the last three years. Richards said the department allowed for the possibility of losing the meet in its annual budget.

Deb Nelson, Big Eight director of championships, said the track was suffering from a sinkhole and that the surface of the track, as a whole, needed some repairs.

"First of all, it is not a sinkhole," Capriotti said. "It's a part of the track that has just bubbled in and out due to the weather conditions and the use on the track itself."

Capriotti said his main worry about not being the host of the meet is that it will take away potential recruits who may have otherwise signed with K-State.

No stampede expected

Leeuwenberg says Cats a different team

BILL LANG

Sports Writer

One of the reasons for K-State's 4-2 start this season can be traced to time of possession. So far, the Wildcats have held the ball for 34:33, about eight minutes longer than their opponents.

This might play into the hands of Saturday's opponent, No. 16

Jay Leeuwenberg

Colorado. The Buffaloes have a quick-striking team that has averaged 36 points a game with an average possession time of 30 minutes.

A problem the Cats will face is the Buffs' bigger offensive line. That unit is anchored by one of the nation's best centers, Jay Leeuwenberg.

Leeuwenberg, a 6-3, 265-pound senior co-captain, was listed as a preseason Outland Trophy candidate. He was also chosen as a preseason AP All-American and listed by several publications as the No. 1 center in the country.

Leeuwenberg remembered last year's K-State-Colorado matchup, which the Buffs won 64-3. Colorado went on to win the national championship.

The center said he expects a different game this weekend.

"I'm not sure if I'm right, but last year they came to our place with a 5-5 record, and that was a good season for them," Leeuwenberg said. "But maybe before playing that game, they felt they had accomplished what they wanted during the year and didn't care what happened afterward."

Leeuwenberg said that the Buffaloes approached last year's game with a bit more hunger, because they wanted to make a return trip to the Orange Bowl.

He added that he was somewhat surprised by K-State's performance against No. 9 Nebraska Saturday in a 38-31 loss.

"They were just running wild up there," Leeuwenberg said. "They ran a lot of stunts and were able to do what they wanted."

Leeuwenberg said the inexperienced members of the Colorado line will have their hands full with the experienced K-State line.

"They have everybody back and they all have to remember what happened to them last year," he said. "They all know what each other's responsibilities are and if they get one sack, they're going to start coming in from everywhere."

Colorado's offense has one advantage, however, that most teams in the country don't. They have the multiple threat of quarterback Darian Hagan.

"He brings a lot to our offense," he said. "He runs around behind us and then, all of sudden, he's run for a gain of five yards."

Hagan has rushed for 264 yards and one touchdown this season. He's also passed for 824 yards and 10 touchdowns, returned 16 punts for a 12.3 average and even caught a pass good for 28 yards.

Together, Hagan is among the league's leaders in all-purpose yards with 219 yards a game.

Leeuwenberg said the main asset that Hagan and the rest of the offensive players have is quickness.

Wanted: A Big 8 victory

Spikers hope drought will end at Missouri

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

It was, as expected, a tough loss that the K-State volleyball team suffered against Big Eight power Nebraska Tuesday to fall to 0-6 in the conference and 9-14 overall.

But the 15-3, 15-9, 15-7 loss against the Cornhuskers in their home arena in Lincoln is already in the past. K-State coach Patti Hagemeyer doesn't talk much about it.

"Nebraska is a very good volleyball team," she said. "They are a much more improved volleyball team than they were when we played them earlier this season. We did what we could do against them."

Enough said about the Huskers. Hagemeyer is looking ahead.

The Wildcats return to the court tonight against Missouri at the Hearnes Center in Columbia. Both teams are winless in Big Eight play.

For Hagemeyer, that fact is no reason to get nervous or to start thinking about any special tactics. She said she is looking at the game like any other match.

"We are going in the game with the attitude that we need to play well to win," Hagemeyer said.

She does realize, however, that the Tigers are almost a clone of the Cats.

"Missouri is, in some ways, like we are," Hagemeyer said. "Sometimes they struggle with their consistency, sometimes they struggle with believing whether they can actually play like they want. However, we are ready to play, ready to compete."

To envision a win against Missouri, which is 5-15 overall and 0-5 in conference play, is not an illusion.

Pill second only to abstinence

Birth control device's effectiveness requires responsibility and dedication

HOLLY ZABEL
A&E Writer

Next to abstinence, the pill is one of the best birth control methods.

Many women at K-State have chosen the pill as their form of birth control, and according to the Ortho Pharmaceutical Corp., the pill is the most effective form of birth control available.

Taking the pill, however, takes a lot of responsibility and dedication. For 21 days, the woman is obligated to take her pill within one hour of the same time every day.

If the pill is forgotten, she can catch up by taking two the next day. If more than three days have gone by without taking the pill, the woman is risking a potential pregnancy, according to Ortho.

"If taking the pill was up to guys, I don't think I would do it," said Shawn Boettner, freshman in pre-medicine. "It would be too hard to remember. Personally, I'd just wrap it."

Catherine Barry, supervisor of Lafene's Women's Clinic, said physicians base their decisions of pill choice for a woman on the client's medical history, the physician's own practices, and what is available.

According to Barry, the pills Lafene prescribes are low-dose pills, containing the hormones progesterone and estrogen, because of their decreased health risks.

Before the pill is prescribed, however, the client must go through a series of tests, such as screening lab work, height, weight, blood pressure, breast cancer test, a pap smear, and a sexually transmitted disease screen, Barry said.

Barry said despite a client passing all these tests, some women are still at risk to serious side effects such as heart attack, stroke or blood clots.

"Usually, the women at risk are smokers, obese or insulin dependent diabetics," Barry said.

According to Barry, these clients are counseled about the trouble signs to look for such as abdominal pain, chest pain, headaches, eye problems,

THE PILL

Although the pill is one of the most effective forms of birth control, there are some drawbacks.

ADVANTAGES

- Most effective birth control behind abstinence
- Less cramping
- Lighter blood flow during menstruation
- Protection against some cancers

DISADVANTAGES

- Increase chance of heart attacks
- Could cause strokes in some women
- Blood clots could be more likely
- Women at a greater risk of side effects are smokers, obese, or insulin-dependent diabetics.

severe leg pain, shortness of breath and severe depression.

The pill also has many benefits, according to Ortho. The benefits include less cramping, lighter blood flow during menstruation and protection against various cancers.

Barry says that another benefit to using the pill is that it doesn't interrupt the act of lovemaking.

Even though the pill is a highly effective form of birth control, Barry recommends that a condom is still used to prevent the spreading of STDs.

"The pill is good if you're like girlfriend or boyfriend, but it's not good for a one-night stand, cause you gotta use a condom," said Anson Renshaw, junior in environmental design.

Some women feel like birth control is seen as their responsibility too often, and would like to see a birth control pill for men.

"I think birth control pills for guys is a good idea, cause it seems women have all the responsibilities," said Ann Mays, freshman undecided. "Since women have to give birth to children, men taking birth control would make it more fair."

Not all women think a pill for men would be a good idea.

Driver's license IDs to change

Nine-digit number to replace six-digit code by April 1992

KATIE WALKER
Staff Writer

The six-digit driver's license number will soon be a thing of the past. In its place will be either the driver's social security number or another random, computer-generated, nine-digit number.

As a part of the Commercial Motor Vehicle Safety Act of 1986, all states are required to comply with this new system by April 1, 1992.

Ken Clark, public information officer for the Kansas Division of Vehicles, said commercial licenses will be required to use the driver's social security number.

"Commercial licenses are issued to people driving a gross vehicle weight of more than 26,000 pounds or carrying hazardous materials," Clark said.

On the other hand, using the social security number is optional for all other types of driver's licenses.

"If we ask a person for their social security number and they refuse to give it, we can generate a nine-digit number to correspond with the social security number," said Clark. "But that number will not be the social security number."

Riley County Police Department Capt. Nick Edvy said, "The six-digit number and letters system has been used for a long time. Each number and each letter stood for certain criteria like the person's sex and name."

In the past, people have held strongly to the belief that their social security number was off-limits information to everyone else.

"People believed that they could be identified by one number," said Edvy. "In a more computerized society, there are many ways to know about people anyway, so the social security number has lost the mystique of being a private number."

Although the Division of Vehicles would not comment, Edvy speculated that "there's an indication that most people will go with their social security number because it's easier for

Quick Cats store adopts new logo

Purple cat head emblem borrowed from Alumni Association

ERIN BURKE
Staff Writer

Quick Cats convenience store in Van Zile Hall has decided on a logo.

The store will be adopting the same logo the Alumni Association uses, said John Pence, associate director of housing and dining services. The purple cat head found on K-State paraphernalia is the logo that will be implemented for Quick Cats use.

"We never had a logo to begin with,"

Pence said.

A sign out front was just to show people the store was there, said Mark Brady, junior in hotel and restaurant management and Quick Cats employee.

Early in September, controversy arose because the Van Zile store's sign had a design on it similar to the logo of Shop Quik, a local convenience store chain.

Quick Cats "logo" was never printed on cups or anything else in the store, but Shop Quik's owner said he was disappointed Quick Cats couldn't be more creative in designing their sign.

Some also charged the store was unfair competition for local convenience stores since it was part of the University, but housing officials said its main purpose was simply to serve residence hall residents better.

No changes will be made in response to the criticism, except to implement the Alumni Association's logo, Pence said.

Brady said the controversy didn't damage business at all.

The busy times and the slow times stayed the same throughout the dispute, he said.

The only way to tell if students like the store is to ask them, and there has only been positive feedback, Pence said.

"We planned to make it (Quick Cats) convenient for the students," Pence said.

Most students who come to Quick Cats live in the surrounding dorms or close to campus, Brady said. The store is more convenient for dorm residents, and prices, especially on fountain drinks, are lower than other convenience stores.

"I would say 95 percent of the people that go there are students," Pence said.

Speakers urge celebration

Female-male diversity subject of BrotherPeace panel

MELANIE HUNDLEY
Collegian Reporter

The differences of women and men should be celebrated because of the diversity in their opinions and perspectives.

But, women still face different challenges in the work place than men. Realizing their unique contributions as women, selecting child care and obtaining job experience are some issues working women must consider.

These conclusions were made during a panel discussion titled "What Women Have Learned in Their Careers that They Wish They Had Learned in College," a part of BrotherPeace Week activities Wednesday at noon in the Union Courtyard.

Panelists were Ruth Dyer, associate professor of electrical and computer engineering; Rep. Sheila Hochhauser, D-Manhattan and Sandra Barnett, client services coordinator of the Manhattan Crisis Center Inc.

Dyer said while in college she had the perception that as a woman she wasn't different than her male colleagues. But, she said she realized that wasn't the case.

"Women and men approach problems differently," Dyer said. "Women bring their own experience which is an interesting perspective that males can't bring."

Dyer said the example of the treatment of women on the job should be set by those in charge.

Hochhauser said she had been in a work situation where stereotypical behavior was very evident. She said the women of the office were expected to organize the social functions in addition to their regular jobs.

"It was more difficult for single women because they didn't have a family," she said. "It was assumed that since she didn't have a husband and children that she didn't need any time to herself."

Duke

won 44 percent of the white vote to finish second in Saturday's open primary behind former Democratic Gov. Edwin Edwards. He knocked incumbent Republican Gov. Buddy Roemer out of the Nov. 16 runoff.

Many analysts see three main groups as putting Duke in the runoff. There are Reaganite Republicans who like Duke's message, and there are protest voters whose ballot for Duke is really against "professional politicians."

"Then there are the out-and-out racists who dislike blacks, they resent blacks increasingly as they enter the mainstream. They must confront blacks in the middle class," said Weill, a Baton Rouge consultant and pollster.

He figures this group comprises one-fourth of Duke's support. Another analyst, Edward Renwick, director of the Loyola University Institute of Politics in New Orleans, said, "At least half of his total vote was racially oriented."

In an interview, Duke, a state representative, said his appeal comes partly from his record as a fiscal conservative in the Legislature and other economic policies, but he repeated his innocuous-sounding racial mantra, too: "Equal rights for all."

By that, he means no more affirmative action, no racial preferences to make up for past discrimination. For many supporters, the phrase represents code words for an end to welfare fraud, which they see as mainly a black problem, and a hard line on crime, again with mainly black perpetrators.

Duke supporters, in interviews from the cotton fields of the Mississippi Delta to the Cajun parishes further south, denied they are anti-black but cited welfare cheating and crime first as reasons to vote for Duke.

"You got to get some of these leeches off your legs," said Fields, a divorced mother of four who grew up in public housing outside New Orleans.

Wolf Creek wins approval from investigators

Power failure response lauded by nuclear commission

By the Associated Press

BURLINGTON — With two exceptions, Wolf Creek nuclear power plant employees responded properly to a power failure that caused the loss of water from a pool that cools spent nuclear fuel, the Nuclear Regulatory Commission said.

The agency sent a team of five federal investigators to the eastern Kansas plant after the incident Sept. 23. It happened as the plant was being closed for routine maintenance expected to last until around Thanksgiving.

A report from the NRC's regional office in Arlington, Texas, dated Oct. 18, was received Wednesday by plant officials and others.

"The operators' response to the event, with two exceptions, was timely and appropriate considering the procedures, indications and alarms the operators had," the report said. "Their training and familiarity with the plant were assets in coping with the event."

The NRC made recommendations for changes in procedures and equipment, and Ronn Smith, spokesman for the Wolf Creek Nuclear Operating Corp., said most have already been put into effect, or will be as soon as possible.

"We understand what happened, and we know how to prevent it from happening again," Smith said.

Plant employees were getting ready to do maintenance on a transformer when the power loss occurred, shutting down two of the four reactor coolant pumps and two service water pumps, as well as a pneumatic air valve.

Smith said an electrician had closed a circuit breaker cabinet door, activating a protective relay and interrupting power to a number of areas, none of them related to safety functions.

"As far as we can tell, he didn't do anything wrong," Smith said. "He didn't slam the door or kick it. He just closed it, and the vibration caused it to activate."

Smith said the company plans to either move that circuit breaker to another area or replace it with one less susceptible to vibration.

The loss of power affected air supply that operates inflatable seals, allowing water to drain from the spent fuel pool into the fuel transfer canal.

"The result was that we drained a little over three feet of water into the transfer canal," said Smith.

them to remember."

Edvy said that a driver's license number is asked for in case of an accident.

"When we investigate vehicle accidents and traffic citations, everything we do will be placed under that number."

Clark said that Kansas IDs will also switch to a nine-digit number.

"Kansas IDs are cards for those people who don't want or can't get a Kansas driver's license, but who need a form of identification to cash a check or something," he said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN IN-FOCUS

Pictures and words by J. Kyle Wyatt

Where the Buffalo Vacation

LEFT: Cawker City is home to the World's Largest Ball of Twine, started in 1953. BELOW: The ball is made of twine people bring from all over the state. BOTTOM: Electric shovel Big Brutus towers 16 stories above tourists at its permanent home near West Mineral.

Hunter S. Thompson knows where the buffalo roam, but where do they go for vacation?

Wednesday, Oct. 16 — Two-lane highways were calling my name. I was in search of buffalo on vacation. The concrete and asphalt crisscrossing the state made roadside attractions my best bet.

I left Manhattan later than I'd planned. Since caffeine is a crucial part of my road trips, it was necessary to pick up a case of Coke, along with a carton of cigarettes, before leaving town. I slammed down the accelerator of my little maroon Ford Escort and flew past old gas stations out of use since the 1940s.

I reached the town of Lucas before The Garden of Eden closed. In 1904, H.P. Dinsmoor began building a cabin there. No two doors or windows are the same dimension.

But the house doesn't compare to the concrete statues and figures with which Dinsmoor filled the surrounding yard. The figures, which tell the stories of Adam and Eve, Cain and Abel and modern and political satire, were created using 2,273 bags of concrete.

"Just don't take any pictures in the mausoleum," said Dewayne Palmer of Lucas, my guide through the garden.

Before his death in 1932, Dinsmoor built his own coffin out of a bathtub and is now lying in eternal rest in the mausoleum, which he also built for all to see.

Cawker City, four cigarettes and two Cokes to the north, was my next destination. Cawker City is home to the World's Largest Ball of Twine.

An elderly man there offered to sell me a postcard of the ball. As I was leaving, he told me he was the cousin of Frank Stoeber, who started this whole twine thing. His name was Harold Reling, and he gave me the truth behind the World's Largest Ball of Twine.

It seems Stoeber tripped on a piece of twine one day and broke his leg. Suffering from the boredom of recuperation, he began to roll some twine between his fingers into a ball.

And so was born what is now the pride of an entire community.

I again drove north. This time, I ended up 12 miles from the Nebraska border and the Geographic Center of the Coterminous U.S. of A., north of Lebanon. This landmark is literally in the middle of nowhere. It was a perfect relic of the bygone days of highway vacations.

The site was complete with the Center Chapel and a long-abandoned motel for the weary traveler. As the sun rapidly set in the West, I again took to the two-lane highways.

Determined to reach the next point in my journey before midnight, I pushed my little Escort a bit faster, slugged down another Coke and opened a fresh pack of Camels.

Prairie Dog Town sits just off the junction of I-70 and U.S. Highway 83 about 7 miles north of Oakley and is in the midst of a 24-hour cafe and truck wash, across the highway from a big steak restaurant. There was ample room to park in a corner and catch some sleep in the back of my car.

Thursday, Oct. 17 — A blazing western Kansas sun woke me around 11 a.m. Once again, I was late. After visiting Prairie Dog Town, I still had to drive 175 miles to Greensburg before the World's Largest Hand-Dug Well closed.

The woman at Prairie Dog Town seemed very untrusting of the press. She made me pay the $3.75 admission fee and still wouldn't let me take pictures of the six-legged steer.

Feeling very unwelcome I was quickly on my winding way again. There were buffalo at Prairie Dog Town, but they didn't appear to be vacationing.

The drive to Greensburg took me through the heart of the western plains. Apparently there wasn't enough caffeine and nicotine in my system yet. Garden City. Ness City. Dodge City. Greensburg.

After driving in 90-degree heat, the cool depths of the Largest Hand-Dug Well felt refreshing. This really deep hole (109 feet) is advertised by countless signs on the highway, in the town and over the well itself. The cool air down inside unfortunately diminished the grandeur of the well itself. Besides, there were no buffalo there, either.

A quick stop in Kinsley was my next objective. Like any self-respecting tourist, I took my own picture under the halfway sign — that is, the sign that reads "1,561 miles to New York, 1,561 miles to San Francisco." It was comforting to know I was the same distance from two places I would rather be than where I currently was.

I was back on the road again, but my supply of Coca-Cola was shrinking. I still had a very long drive as I started the last leg of my trip, and I realized I would end up resorting to convenience-store coffee for caffeine. At 2 a.m., I was sleeping in my car behind such a store in Yates Center.

Friday, Oct. 18 — Oddly enough, I woke up by 7 a.m. For once, I would be on time. My destination on this day: Big Brutus.

■ See BUFFALO Page 14

ABOVE: For $1, you can descend into the world's deepest hand-dug well in Greensburg.

The halfway point for North America lies in Kinsley, which has a roadside park with a sign marking the spot. Like countless other tourists, I had to have a picture with the sign.

Big Brutus was used from 1963 to 1974 to strip mine coal. The behemoth cost $6.5 million when purchased by The Pittsburg & Midway Coal Mining Co. of Pittsburg.

Purple Masque threatened

Aging, valuable theater may be demolished for art museum

JANE ROESNER
Collegian Reporter

Constructing the Marianna Kistler Beach Art Museum south of Ahearn Field House would mean the end of the Purple Masque Theatre, located in East Stadium.

Carl Hinrichs, associate professor of speech, said this would lead to a space crunch for the Department of Speech because the theater provides valuable classroom, rehearsal, storage and performance space.

With McCain Auditorium taking away one rehearsal area to use as a greenroom and dance classes moving into Nichols Hall, space is especially tight, he said.

"It would be rather devastating, unless they find a way of replacing the Purple Masque Theatre," Hinrichs said. "What people don't realize is that theater goes 18 hours a day, seven days a week."

Tom Rawson, vice president for administration and finance, said seven museum sites are under consideration. Rawson said the option to demolish

East Stadium and build on the site is one of his least favorites.

"That site just has a lot of disadvantages," he said.

Site drawbacks include the costs of destroying the building and carting away the debris, as well as finding new offices for campus police, telecommunications and the speech department, he said.

No building will be constructed to replace those offices, he said.

The museum's construction cost has been estimated at $5 million. If the site south of Ahearn is chosen, Rawson said the museum would have to be smaller, or the budget would have to increase to offset the cost of debris clearance.

Each site has advantages and disadvantages, Rawson said. The art museum building planning committee, along with the committees on campus parking, landscape advisory and development, will examine each site to determine which is best.

"At this point, we're not ready to go forward with a proposition," Rawson said.

Committee members generally agree that the museum will be on the south side of the campus, he said.

Hinrichs said although he has worked in the theater for 27 years, he would not be upset by its demolition if a new facility was available.

"It's a bad building, and it's an old building," he said. "I have no qualms that it probably should come down."

Homer Socolofsky, professor of history and University historian, said East Stadium probably would not be considered a historical landmark.

"It doesn't meet the criteria for age and lack of change, things of that sort," he said. "There are other buildings, even some on this campus, that would be more likely to have the criteria for nomination."

Memorial Stadium was constructed as a memorial to the K-State students who died in World War I. The west wing was completed in September 1923, the east wing in 1924.

Fire

fire, he said. "All we can do is hope for rain," he said.

None of the fires were near the border of the installation, he said. Last week, when a fire spread off the installation near the town of Keats, Riley County Rural firefighters were called. Meseke said that has been the only fire to leave Fort Riley land.

One to two acres of a ditch and Manhattan Municipal Airport land burned at the corner of Wildcat Creek Road and Highway K-18, said Pat Collins, emergency preparedness and assistant fire chief for Riley County. The cause of the fire has not been determined.

"It appeared it might be caused by smoking materials," he said.

The airport crash truck extinguished the fire.

Firefighters from Hunter's Island were called back to an area south of Manhattan near Temple Lane where a grass fire burned Tuesday. Leaves blew into logs and trees that had been burned, then caught fire, Collins said. Rural firefighters were called to the Hunter's Island scene again.

Firefighters moved the logs and trees onto the burned area to prevent more flare-ups, he said.

Collins said he attributes the number of fires to the dry weather conditions.

The RCRFD was called to a grass fire near 1015 Temple Lane for a third time Wednesday evening.

Collins said the fire that burned more than 30 acres was deliberately set.

"I don't know how the initial fire started," Collins said, "but not only did we have a second fire rekindle that we can't explain, we now have a third one."

There were several places where it appeared someone had dropped matches in the fallen leaves, Collins said.

Scott Sowell, 1015 Temple Lane, said he and his wife returned home at about 2 p.m., Wednesday, and saw the fire in the borrow pits, east of his home. The pits were made when dirt was taken from the area to build dikes near the Kansas River.

"It's strange," Sowell said. "There's not that many people out here to start a fire, but it would be pretty easy for someone to get down here without being seen."

"There used to be water in the pits, but it's real dry now," he said.

Collins said a few days ago, someone had seen a youth running from an area where a small fire was discovered.

"If someone is doing what I think they're doing," Collins said pointing north of the blaze, "the fire will be over there next time."

Firefighters spent much of the night cutting the burning portions from trees and saturating the area with a special foam designed to soak into wood in an attempt to stop the fire from spreading.

Broken Wings (Train d'enfer) O Vertigo Dance

Saturday, November 2, 8 p.m.

Montreal's hottest choreographer, Ginette Laurin, has won over audiences and wowed critics with her fresh, dynamic approach; the almost acrobatic virtuosity of her strikingly individual dancers; and the theatricality of her original, entertaining performances.

Join her as she takes the seven members of O Vertigo Dance into a twilight-zone train station. Over these restless wanderers, angels appear and give rise to a dance that transforms the commonplace into a fantastic journey.

"Train d'enfer (Broken Wings) is a hundred miles of rolling stock crowded into an hour." (The Globe and Mail, Toronto)

Winter

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 1 such as ocean temperatures. But, Martin stressed that type of indication also would have a 50-60 percent chance of being accurate.

Climate is the average condition of a given season over a number of years, said O'Lenic. That is why the climate analysis center focuses on the weather records.

"We try to relate what has happened in the previous years from one season to the next to weather in the current year," said O'Lenic.

Wheat

Since both the Amigo and Hamlet lines are from different chromosomes, both lines can be easily combined in the same wheat variety. It would be possible although more difficult to combine the two if they were from the same chromosomes.

Although they cannot be called mistakes, there are translocations that are unpopular with some industries.

Volleyball

■ CONTINUED FROM PAGE 5 Sherman are in the middle of a five-game losing streak. Sherman's team has shown a lack of efficiency on its offensive line, as it is last in the league in kills. The Cats will also face a weak blocking team, but the Tigers lead the league in service aces with 150.

Unlike Hagemeyer, K-State team captain Kathy Saxton was confident in predicting an outcome for tonight's match.

"Against Missouri, we will win. Definitely," Saxton said. "You can take my word on this."

UNITED WAY

SOME FAMILY TRADITIONS WERE MEANT TO BE STOPPED.

Terry's world was shattered when she learned her children were being abused by their father. "I had the perfect husband," she says. "And I found out it wasn't perfect."

The family decided to come to one of the United Way agencies which works with families from all races and social backgrounds who have been victimized by abuse. Such agencies restore optimism and hope, and break the chain of abuse so that each family helped may never have to face the problem again.

Terry is grateful for the help the United Way has provided, and hopes that others can benefit, too. As she puts it, "If it's only for the protection and growth of one child, and one family that gets back together or stays together, it would be worth it."

Please make your pledge today. Ask your employer for a pledge card or call the United Way office at 776-3779. Sponsored by Circle K.

THETA DOT MCC—Tonight's the night that awaits you, I'm sure you still don't have a clue. I'll be waiting! Love, Your Mom.

THETA HOLLISTER—I've kept you guessing all week, with the string you shall seek. A mommy that loves you. And will always be true. Love, Mom.

THETA JENNA—It's time for us to be together, a mom and dot pair we'll be forever. Come right over after the show, follow the string and then you'll know! Love, Mom.

THETA JENNIFER N.—Tonight's the night, your mom is in sight. Grab ahold of the string, much happiness it will bring. Love, Mom.

THETA JENN M.—The time has come for you to see just who your Theta mom will be. So hurry up, don't be late, at 9:00 we have a date! Theta love, Mom.

THETA JRM—You've had some suspicion about who I might be. But tonight your guessing's over, you'll be part of the family. Just follow your yarn, my lovely dot. A surprise will come. I kid you not. Love—Mom.

THETA JULIE B.—Soon you'll see who I may be. So follow the string and at the end you'll find me! Your Mom.

THETA JULIE O.—I can't wait to see who you think I might be. All I know is that we'll definitely be hot once we finally are together as mom and dot. Love, Mom.

THETA KAFF—Tonight's the night you will see, what a great mom I am to thee. A mutual friend brought us together, but Theta will continue the friendship forever. Love, Mom.

THETA KRISTEN H.—Kites fly high, twin stars shine—I can't wait to see you mine. Love, Mom.

THETA KRISTEN F.—Tonight's the night you will be in the limelight, wear your dot and bring your fish too! We Love you! Mom and Grandma.

THETA KRISTI N.—We will raise some hell. And have a ball. Because after tonight. You will know all. Love, Mom.

THETA KRISTIN B.—The Day has come for you to see, what a great pair we will be. Love, Mom.

THETA KRISTEN M.—Kites and twin stars bright, you will get the best mom tonight! Theta Love, Mom.

THETA MITZ—You think you know who I might be, but wonderful dot, just wait and see. Tonight's the night to end your quest—our mom dot pair will be the best! Love—Mom.

THETA NORBY—Thursday is here at last, but mom dot fun will always last. Tonight's the night you become my brat. Cuz being in my family is where it's at! Theta Love, Mom.

PRINCIPLES of SOUND RETIREMENT INVESTING

BEFORE TRUSTING YOUR FUTURE TO ANY COMPANY, ASK FOR SOME LETTERS OF REFERENCE.

You put more than just your savings into a retirement company. You put in your trust and hopes for the future, too. So before you choose one, ask some questions. How stable is the company? How solid are its investments? How sound is its overall financial health?

A good place to start looking for answers is in the ratings of independent analysts. Three companies, all widely recognized resources for finding out how strong a financial services company really is, gave TIAA their top grade.

IN THE FINAL ANALYSIS, TIAA IS LETTER-PERFECT.

TIAA received A+ from A.M. Best Co., AAA from Standard & Poor's and Aaa from Moody's Investors Service. These ratings reflect TIAA's reliable claims-paying ability, exceptional financial strength, superior investment performance, and low expenses. With its guaranteed rate of return and opportunity for dividends, TIAA is one of less than ten companies, out of 2,200 nationwide, that received these highest marks.

CREF. FOUR MORE LETTERS EVERYONE SHOULD KNOW.

For further growth potential and diversification, there's the CREF variable annuity with four different investment accounts to give you the flexibility you want as you save for the future.

Together, TIAA and CREF form the nation's largest private retirement system, with over $95 billion in assets and more than 70 years of experience serving the education community. For over one million people nationwide, the only letters to remember are TIAA-CREF.

SEND NOW FOR A FREE RETIREMENT INVESTMENT KIT, including a Special Report on TIAA investments. Mail this coupon to: TIAA-CREF, Dept. QC, 730 Third Avenue, New York, NY 10017. Or call 1 800-842-2733, Ext. 8016.

Jury ends investigation

No indictments issued in state corruption allegations

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — A Shawnee County grand jury issued no criminal indictments when it finished three months of deliberations on Thursday, but it did make policy recommendations to government officials.

The 15-member grand jury began investigating allegations of government corruption in July. Some of the allegations concerned Gov. Joan Finney's administration and the statewide reappraisal of property for tax purposes that was completed in 1989.

The grand jury issued a one-page statement through the office of Shawnee County District Judge E. Newton Vickers' office. Its recommendations include tougher campaign disclosure laws.

"The grand jury encourages members of the public to remain informed and continue their involvement to hold government officials accountable for their acts," the grand jury's statement said.

The grand jury was impaneled after a local group, Citizens for Honesty in Government, gathered signatures on petitions. County Financial Administrator Dennis Taylor said cost of the grand jury totaled $9,851, with possibly a few more payment requests to come in.

CHIG President Ed Engel of Topeka called the grand jury's report a "whitewash."

"What a farce," he said. "It's really unfortunate that we picked such a bunch of wimps. They were too weak, mentally and spiritually and every other way."

Vickers described the grand jury's investigation as thorough, adding, "The court is extremely grateful."

The judge said the lack of indictments on Thursday does not preclude the filing of criminal charges later. However, he was speaking generally and would not comment on whether indictments might come later.

Koplik's plan in use

Controversial mission statement still under debate by Board of Regents

PAT OBLEY

City/Government Editor

Until further amendments are made, the guidelines of Stanley Koplik's mission statement to the Board of Regents will be used by regent schools.

Known notoriously as the "Super Chancellor" plan by Koplik opponents, the statement called for every department of each regent school to review its programs and submit the finished review to the Topeka office.

Opponents believe once the reviews are submitted, the board would decide whether the program should continue to be funded or if it should be discontinued under the plan's guidelines.

Koplik, who visited K-State with board chairman Jack Sampson, said the people discrediting the plan did not read the statement thoroughly.

"What triggered the whole thing was one element which was interpreted by people as meaning the Board of Regents would have more authority over school budgets," Koplik said. "If somebody would read the whole statement, they would see that the schools would make their request, and the board would present that to the Legislature."

Sampson said the mission statement has been referred to the Council of Chief Academic Officers for revision. The revised version will be presented at the December board meeting.

Meanwhile, Sampson said, each school is writing its own mission statement, all of which will be presented at the board's November meeting.

"We want input from the universities," Sampson said. "They have very good ideas. All the board wants is to get the job done and get it done right."

Koplik said, despite the debate surrounding it, his plan should survive

Talk vital for rape victims

Emotional release necessary, says University counselor

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

The intensity of rape trauma will never fade if victims don't try to talk about it, counselors say.

Whether a victim chooses to tell a friend or a professional counselor, an emotional release is vital to recovering from a rape, said John Robertson, psychologist with University Counseling Services.

"When we give words to an experience, we make it real," he said. "When we don't put it into words, it can take on a power all its own."

In addition to UCS, rape survivor counseling is also available through the Crisis Center Inc.

Angie McClure, sexual assault services coordinator, said she first tries to determine how much counseling a victim has had, if any. If the rape has just occurred, she asks if the woman wants to go to the hospital or police, but she said she leaves the decision to the victim.

McClure and Robertson said, however, that seeking immediate help is important, both to ensure the woman's health and collect evidence if she later decides to prosecute.

"Going to the hospital is important because you don't need to be hurt anymore," McClure said. "It's important that you take care of yourself."

But not all rape survivors seek help right after the attack.

Some wait a few days before talking about it; others bottle it up for years and try to forget or deny the attack.

"The intensity of the feelings can be just as great at two years as at two months," Robertson said, if the person doesn't talk about it.

There is no wrong way to respond to a rape, he said. Whether a survivor is upset or composed will depend on her personality.

Though each victim will respond differently to rape, many experience a number of the same emotions.

Most common seems to be the victim's feeling she will never be able Student's murder remains a mystery

PAT OBLEY

City/Government Editor

More than a month later, the killing of a K-State student remains a mystery to the Geary County Sheriff's Department and the Kansas Bureau of Investigation.

Sept. 20, the body of Catherine Heintze, sophomore in arts and sciences, was found in Pate's Convenience Corner where she had been working.

Since then, many leads have been pursued, but the investigation has failed to yield any answers, Geary County Sheriff Bill Deppish said.

"Nothing new has developed," Deppish said. "We continue to track down many leads."

Deppish also said a $4,000 reward is being offered by various agencies for information leading to an arrest or a conviction in the case.

KBI Director Jim Malson said his agency is aggressively pursuing new leads.

"There are several avenues we continue to pursue," Malson said. "This continues to be a very active investigation."

"There is no reliable timetable for when we will have a suspect in mind. It all depends on a number of variables," he said. "There is no way to predict a date and place. It might be tomorrow, or it might be some time from now."

Although chances of making a homicide arrest tend to decrease as more time passes, Deppish said there is no reason Heintze case will go unsolved.

Student's records vanish

Typing error to blame for loss of schedule, financial aid

DENISE UPHOFF

Collegian Reporter

A typing error caused one student to be mistakenly dropped from the University.

Registrar Donald Foster said as near as he can tell, Gina Anderson, junior in pre-nursing, was mistakenly withdrawn from the University because of an error entering a social security number from a withdrawal form.

"The student enrolled in April and supposedly withdrew in September," Foster said. "At least, we processed a withdrawal of that social security number."

Anderson said she found out about the mix-up when she went to pick up her financial aid check, which she thought was just late.

"I asked if my check was there, and they said it wasn't," she said. "They told me I had withdrawn from school, and I wouldn't get any checks."

When she asked why she had been withdrawn, the financial aid office said they did not know and sent her to the enrollment center.

"At first (the enrollment center) thought there were two Gina Andersons and they got the two mixed up, but that wasn't the case," she said.

Sharon Hauck, enrollment center administrative officer, said she had no idea what happened.

"I assume somewhere along the lines someone entered in a wrong digit on the social security number, and it just happened to be hers," Hauck said.

Hauck said she re-enrolled Anderson and sent her to see about retrieving her financial aid.

To get it, Anderson said she had to go through the whole process again.

She said the bank approved her new loan Oct. 4, but when she went to pick up her check Oct. 11, it wasn't ready yet.

"I told them I wasn't waiting any longer," Anderson said. "I felt like I shouldn't have to wait any longer because I had waited an extra month that was unnecessary."

Anderson said because she had been mistakenly withdrawn from the University, she was no longer on any class rosters.

"My teachers didn't know I was supposed to be in their classes. I had to go and explain it to them and tell them why I was not on their rosters but should be," she said.

■ See CONFUSE Page 14

SHANE KEYSER/Staff

Gina Anderson, junior in pre-nursing, is unsure if she is actually a student at K-State. She enrolled in April, but when she went to pick up financial aid in September, she was informed that she had withdrawn and would not be receiving any money. She will have to wait until semester's end to realize if her attendance was for naught.

Fort Riley expands to full strength

FORT RILEY (AP) — Fort Riley and the 1st Infantry Division have gained up to 3,000 new soldiers as troop strength has been reduced in Europe, the base and division commander said.

And the base will remain at above its normal strength for at least another year, Maj. Gen. William W. Hartzog said.

"We haven't gained any new units, but we have gained new people, and that has strained the support structure and the housing," Hartzog said at a media briefing Wednesday.

Some personnel are going 30 miles from the post to find housing, he said. About 17,500 are stationed at Fort Riley.

Fort Riley is expected to remain home to the 1st Infantry and its support elements until 1995 and probably beyond, Hartzog said. Rumors and speculation that the 1st Infantry would move to Fort Hood, Texas, are unfounded, he said.

Hartzog also said he supports improvement of railhead facilities at Fort Riley, for which Congress is considering a $6 million appropriation. He also urged upgrading the Manhattan municipal airport to accommodate larger aircraft.

'Star Trek' creator dead at age 70

LOS ANGELES — Gene Roddenberry, the former airline pilot who created the "Star Trek" science fiction television series followed by legions of "Trekkies," died Thursday. He was 70.

Roddenberry died at Santa Monica Medical Center shortly after suffering a heart attack at his doctor's office across the street, Hospital spokesman Ted Braun said.

"Star Trek" is still seen in reruns, even though it was last broadcast by NBC in 1969. It has been reincarnated as a series of movies and a syndicated television series, "Star Trek: The Next Generation," which debuted in 1987.

"Few ideas in the annals of motion picture and television history have inspired more passion and allegiance on the part of the audience than has 'Star Trek,'" said Paramount Pictures chairman Brandon Tartikoff, whose studio made both series and the six "Star Trek" feature films.

"Twenty-five years ago, Gene Roddenberry imagined an optimistic future for us all, and his vision will live on well into that future," Tartikoff said.

Leonard Nimoy, who played the emotionless, alien Mr. Spock, said Roddenberry "had an extraordinary vision about mankind and the potential of mankind's future."

Roddenberry is survived by his wife, Majel, an actress who appeared in both "Star Trek" series, his son, Rod, and daughters Darlene and Dawn.

Student driver ticketed during class

FORT MILL, S.C. (AP) — A high school student who signed up for driver's education thought it could lower auto insurance rates, but the opposite might happen. Christy Schruers got a speeding ticket Friday, while in class.

Her mother, Barbara Schruers Hil-ton, said she wonders what students are being taught in the class.

"I hit the roof. The kid was in the car with a dang teacher, and they have her charged with going 54 in a 35 speed zone," said Hilton. "It's going to cost $90."

The 17-year-old said Fort Mill High instructor Bill Banks and at least two other students were in the car when she was pulled over by an unmarked Highway Patrol car.

Banks would not comment.

"He was aware that he should be looking at the speedometer a little more closely," said the principal, Terry Holliday. "It's something he will be more aware of in the future."

Christy plans to fight the ticket in court in November, and Holliday said the school will try to help.

Scott Maddox, sophomore in arts and sciences, is assisted by David Dettwiler, sophomore in psychology at Manhattan Christian College, in lifting weights at the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex. Maddox and Dettwiler frequent the Rec Complex during the evening hours because it fits well into their schedules and is usually less busy than during the day.

Rec center getting its own workout

Students pack facility to near capacity daily

TRISTAN MOHN
Staff Writer

Sweating bodies dive for the basketball as their Nike™-clad feet pound across the court inside the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex.

At the door, students file through the turnstile after flipping the employees a glimpse at their student IDs.

They crowd either to the weight room adjacent to the basketball court or to the fitness room upstairs.

The clock on the wall of the Rec Complex ticks to 11 p.m., but students still continue to flock through the door. That stream of people remains steady even until closing time at midnight.

Sarah Coffee, senior in exercise science and Rec Complex employee, said the number of people using the facility has reached close to record highs ever since the beginning of the semester.

"In the 2-1/2 years I have worked here, I don't think I've ever seen it this bad," Coffee said.

Saturday is about the only night of the week where the facility is not overflowing with people, she said.

"A lot of people don't work out on Saturday because that's the day they party," she said. "But Sunday, they're right back in there."

As soon as the Rec Complex opens at 6 a.m., people pack into the facility, she said.

It then slows down around 10 a.m. but picks back up around 2 p.m. and is steady until closing at midnight.

"If you can work out between 10 and 2, then you're fine," she said.

Even though the Rec Complex is still crowded in the late evenings, Scott Cissna, graduate student in business, said he usually works out around 10:30 p.m. because it is not as busy as it is in the early evening, plus it fits better into his schedule.

"It's still crowded enough that it's almost an inconvenience," he said. "But not quite."

By this time of the night, he said he has to wait about five minutes to get on the equipment. But that wait doesn't bother his workout too much.

"If I were in a hurry, it would be an inconvenience," he said.

Although the weather is still nice outside, he said he likes to work out at the Rec Complex because of all the different equipment available.

"I've got a mountain bike that I ride quite a bit, but the Rec has more of a variety," he said.

Cory Latham, sophomore in biology and pre-dentistry, also uses the facility two or three times a week in the late evenings.

Senate postpones bills' consideration

EOF Allocation bill to be sent back to committee; computer bill to be read

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Two bills that were supposed to be voted upon by Student Senate were postponed during an emotionally-charged yet non-productive meeting Thursday evening.

The $238,798 Educational Opportunity Fund Allocation for fiscal year 1993 was referred back to committee after heated debate.

A bill to suspend the Senate intern program for next semester was also postponed until next week, but elicited no discussion at that time.

On another issue, there was a first reading of a bill to buy a computer and printer for the Student Government Services office. The equipment is currently in storage because it was ordered improperly this summer by Student Body President Todd Heitschmidt and Senate Advisor Sally Routsen.

The EOF bill was given back to committee after senators expressed concerns about seven amendments intended to be made to the bill.

Generally stated, the amendments were attempts to reinstate money to various groups that were angry about allocations.

Committee Chairman, Darin Batchman, explained that $450,000 worth of proposals were received by the committee, and it has $230,000 to allocate.

"That means you're going to have $220,000 worth of pissed off people," he said. "Either we're going to have to spend all of the reserves money and not look into the future, or cut from groups that have already been allocated money and have more angry people."

Batchman said the committee has a general rule to keep 10-percent of the total fund as a reserve account for unexpected future allocations or financial difficulties.

150,000 volumes to be moved from Farrell

Transfer most likely to begin in April, Hobrock says

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Faculty members have expressed many concerns about moving 150,000 volumes of material from Farrell Library to the KSU Foundation Building on Anderson Avenue.

"There was a lot of misinformation about what we intended to move and how we intended to do it," Dean of Libraries Brice Hobrock said. "I was getting letters from people very concerned about what we might do."

Hobrock said he decided to call a meeting of all department heads in order to outline the process and correct some of the misunderstandings.

Hobrock said faculty wasn't in favor of the move but accepted it because it has to be done. He also said faculty members told him they wanted to be involved in the process.

"The faculty delivered a very strong message to me that they wanted to be involved in the decision-making for what goes to storage," Hobrock said.

He said the faculty wanted to be involved because there is such a wide variation in how different people use books and journals.

"The faculty objects to the fact that the library will make a blanket judgment based on circulation or some other point," Hobrock said.

Theodore Barkley, professor of biology, said he would like to review the selections before they are moved in case he thinks some books shouldn't go.

Hobrock said he expects faculty will be able to review the books that are selected for storage and be able to recommend certain items be kept or substituted.

"By involving the faculty, by giving them the opportunity to review our selections, I think we're making room for their differences in terms of how they use the material," he said.

Hobrock said no decision has been made yet on what will be moved. The decision will most likely be made on the basis of how much time has passed since an item has circulated.

"Our best judgment is that if it hasn't circulated in 10 years, then the odds are small that it won't," he said.

KANSAS STATE COLLEGIAN
OPINIONEDITORIALS*Gangs Curfew not solution to complex crime problem

Imposing curfews is not the answer to stopping or even curbing gang violence.

Kansas City imposed a curfew the first week of September, Wichita passed its own Tuesday, and a city councilman and community group are pushing for one in Topeka.

The intention is good — if you keep kids off the streets late at night, they can't commit as many crimes. And, it sounds good in theory — parents and police officers will enforce it.

But, unfortunately, gang violence is too complex for such a simple solution.

Police, city councils and citizens alike are in awe of the recent, drastic increase in youth violence. Police attribute the violence to an increase in the number and intensity of gangs.

And, understandably, police, city councils and citizens alike are grasping at every possible solution.

But curfews will doubtfully get anyone anywhere.

The old saying that the more you tell someone not to do something, or the harder you make it to do, the more someone wants to do it, is true.

And the curfews will be practically impossible and, no doubt, very expensive to enforce.

Oh, and don't forget about that little matter of constitutional rights. The way the Wichita curfew ordinance, for example, is worded is so vague that, basically anyone who looks suspicious or is in a suspicious place can be questioned.

Curfews are not the solution.

Educate the kids better in the classroom. Pay their teachers and counselors better. Help them get and keep jobs. Educate their parents.

In other words, try to cure the illness instead of treating the symptoms. That's the solution.

Duke a detriment to political game

Once upon a time in a land dominated by elephants and inhabited by donkeys and crows, a white elephant made a ruckus.

The white elephant once hated crows, stomping on them whenever he could. But now, in hopes of leading his herd, he had to coax the crows into riding on his back, like the other elephants had done.

The elephants were kings of the land after thrashing the evil camels of a far off land. Nothing stood in their way — except the donkeys.

In order for either to dominate, the elephants and donkeys had to have the trust of the crows. The elephants had gone a long way toward securing the crows' trust, most recently by nominating one to join their sacred panel of mediators.

The donkeys were losing their fight, and no aid was in sight — until the white elephant came trudging along.

The crows spoke out, and the caws were deafening. "The path of the white one cannot be followed by us," they cawed. "For the crimes of his past does not lend credence to his words in the present or the future."

The elephants quivered at the thought of having to serve the donkeys. So, the Great Elephant of the Bush spoke to save face.

"White Elephant, we cannot support you, for you hated the crows, our best friends. Brother of the Tusks, we are ashamed of your trunk. Go now, and never call yourself an elephant again."

The Bush Elephant (known as king of the fat slob by the donkeys) was pleased with his statement. What he said, he truly meant, but the bottom line was that elephants will never follow a bunch of jackasses.

The donkeys grinned, for they knew what the Bush Elephant meant — and they couldn't wait to tell the crows.

But the crows already knew the score. They scorned the donkeys and the elephants for caring falsely for their well-being, saying for all to hear:

"In the end, it doesn't matter whose path we follow.

Though the White Elephant calls himself true-blue, we know him to be a hazy shade of brown, like you two."

Unfortunately, there is no moral to this fable, for morals do not exist in a world of jackasses and fat slob.

This is a TESTShopping with woman takes patience, courage*JARED GREGOIRE

As with all things, there come so many times in life when even the most fearless must stand on the edge of the abyss, gaze into its forever blackness and continue the search for their true character.

Recently, I experienced such a trial. Perhaps not a trial so implicitly demanding of all my inner faculties. No, not even one calling on the survival instincts accumulated through 22 years of personal evolution. Indeed, my trial would be one demanding only of that particular virtue I often seemingly lack. Patience.

Yes, with youth the blood runs hot and fast, and things that hinder where we are going only serve to dispel any accumulation of forbearance we may have. Anyone who thinks they must be the only one in the world who gets behind every driver in a time warp knows what I'm talking about.

But excuse me, I digress. As I sat down to begin the weekly edification of my usual melancholy column, my girlfriend casually suggested we go on an excursion to the local discount store in order to purchase certain items of which she was in need. Of course, being a male, I was in dire need of looking upon power tools and other such things, so I readily agreed to accompany her.

Oh, was I ever fooling myself into thinking that we would go our separate ways upon arrival, and that I would be free to engage in wildly exotic masculine behavior. Silly, silly me.

"Jared, will you please come with me? It'll only take a minute," she said, the familiar look foretelling of untold things spread across her face.

"Yes, dear," I grunted with authority, that sublime sense of frightful unsureness creeping into my innards as she walked slightly ahead of me like a woman possessed.

Then, all at once, it occurred to me where her final destination lay. "No!" my mind screamed as the stark realization that I had already agreed to follow her set in. We were approaching the health and beauty aids section, and I was utterly trapped. A caged animal.

No, we were not going to inspect the varieties of makeup available or procure cotton balls. No, something much worse than that.

We were on a direct collision course with the Tampon Zone. The Pad Nebula. The Applicator Quasar. The ... the ... the ...

Scotty, please beam me up.

"Uh, dear, would you mind too much if I just went over to the lawn care section and looked at leaf blowers?" I kept my head lowered in defiance, knowing it was my last chance at liberation. And damned if I weren't going to take it.

Then she gave me that look. You know. That Look. No interpreter was necessary for me to discern her message: "What? Are you afraid? Afraid that you'll be recognized by those simian bipeds you call friends?"

With nary a word she had challenged me and managed to insult my boon companions.

For the moment I was silenced as she turned her full attention to choosing whichever brand was necessary. Knowing my flight had failed, I began to access my surroundings in the hope of affecting a possible alternate route of escape. Even then, I could hear the call of the ratchet and drive sets in aisle eight.

But again I realized her challenge to me still existed. I could hardly leave now. And then I realized that a full test of my manhood, my patience, was before me. I would persevere.

"So," I began, trying to feign intelligence on the subject, "precisely what are you looking for?"

Her rebuttal was simple, to the point. "Well, blah, blah, ... no damn mattress ... blah, blah ... seems like only two days ... blah, blah."

Eventually, she finished and we sauntered away, her carrying her 20-cubic-foot box and me feeling as if I'd conquered what must be one of the last bastions of the separation of men from boys.

As we approached the check-out aisle, another couple brushed passed us heading in the exact opposite direction we had just come from. I heard my fellow male say, "How about I go get some Phillips screwdrivers while you look around, dear?"

Oh, silly, silly him.

LETTERS*Library ideas hardly new & improved

Editor,

I would like to address this letter specifically to Lisa Edmunds, the sadly uninformed author of "New & Improved Library Ideas." Fortunately for K-State students, more positive actions are being taken to help Farrell Library than the ones you suggest in your column. It would also appear that many students are better informed.

Student Senate recently established a referendum, which on Nov. 5 and 6 will give students the opportunity to vote on whether current student fees should continue to fund student contribution to the expansion and renovation of Farrell Library, and if current student fees should continue to pay for the expansion of the Chester E. Peters Recreation Complex?

Both of these buildings are in need of expansion and both can be well-taken care of with no increase in current student fees. I can only wish that you might find some positive ways to support both issues.

The Essential Edge Campaign recently received a $2-million commitment to benefit Farrell Library, however, this and other private donations may be in jeopardy if students do not show their commitment by voting "yes" on the referendum.

It is too bad you believe the Rec Complex is for "steroid-pumped athletes." You might be interested to know that more than 78 percent of K-State students participate in Rec Services programs at least once a week. These same people — "the Gatorade crowd," as you refer to them — are also library users and will be needed to support a positive vote for both the Rec Complex and the library.

I am glad that even though you believe "no one else on campus is giving much serious thought to saving Farrell," solutions have been proposed that do not involve praying for natural disasters, having bake sales or collaborating with drug dealers.

Lisa, how about sitting down with your pen and paper and finding a way to get students to vote "yes" for both Nov. 5 or 6 so we can all have the best of what we need and want at K-State.

Reviewer out of touch with reality

Editor,

I read with some amusement the article "Album proves Clapton not God" in the Oct. 18 Collegian.

Author Pat Walleck begins by making a rather emphatic statement, "Eric Clapton is not God," which he justifies with an unfavorable review of Clapton's newest release. Well, Walleck is certainly entitled to his views on any album by any musician. So far, so good.

The author then proceeds to cite a host of other reasons why Clapton is not God, which include, among others, Clapton coveting thy neighbor's wife, his use of heroin, and the most ridiculous — the death of his 4-year-old son after a fall from a 10th-floor window. These all struck me as a singularly mindless attempt at proving a non-existent point. The article only reflects inability on the author's part to distinguish between the figurative and the literal.

Or did Walleck actually believe all this time that Clapton was really God sitting up in the clouds, coming down to Earth only to do his concerts and cut his records? And maybe those are his angels doing the chorus on "Lay down Sally"?

The Collegian would do well to be more selective where articles are concerned and put out interesting material on its columns.

I wouldn't be surprised if, one of these days, someone actually announced in the Collegian the startling discovery that Jim Morrison was not the "Lizard King" because he didn't stick out his long tongue and snap up flies and mosquitoes for supper.

Congrats to those who 'came out'

Editor,

As I sat in Cardwell Hall finishing an assignment Friday, Oct. 11, I heard a student across the hall talking derogatorily about and laughing at the chalk messages on sidewalks across campus proclaiming Gay and Lesbian Coming-Out Day. I was dismayed but not surprised. Though homosexuals have been standing up for themselves much more in the last 10 years or so, most Americans continue to harbor negative, homophobic opinions toward these people.

Much of this attitude comes from the religious view of homosexuality and the supposed perverted behavior of gays and lesbians. Most churches denounce homosexuality as an unnatural attitude that inhibits man and woman from the will of God. This simply is not true. Many homosexual couples claim to feel the true love of a husband and wife in a faithful, successful marriage. And many homosexuals are devout Christians.

Furthermore, gay and lesbian sexual practices are no stranger than heterosexual practices — kinky, extraordinarily disgusting and/or violent sexual behavior is not reserved for any one group. Anyone who went to high school or college knows that.

To those gays and lesbians who came out last week, congratulations! Continue to stand up for yourselves. Eventually, your efforts will make a difference.

Free beer not worth friend's health

Editor,

This letter is intended for the person or persons who tried to steal a keg of beer from the party on 1729 Houston St. Oct. 19.

As I'm sure you remember, you fled from the party with a partially full keg, down the hill in front of the house. My friend, Eric, who was kind enough to be the host of this party, ran after you and caught you in the street.

After getting the keg back, you or a buddy of yours blindsided him with a fist to the head that knocked him out. He then fell and hit the back of his head on the pavement or a rock. I'm not sure which one, because he was alone. I'm sure you felt pretty cool and tough as you ran away.

All of this because you wanted some beer.

Eric is now in a hospital in Topeka suffering from a concussion and a cerebral hemorrhage. No one is sure what effects this will have on him in the future. Are you satisfied?

If you wanted beer, why didn't you just stay at the party and drink? I guess you were just too cheap to pay $2 at a party that had plenty of kegs and two live bands. Yeah, that's a rip-off if I've ever heard one. Be sure to let me know the next time you have a party. I'll come over and do the same.

North, South Korea reach agreement

Plan could lead to peace treaty, unification of nations

By the Associated Press

SEOUL, South Korea — North Korea, whose 1950 invasion of South Korea started a war that has never formally ended, agreed Thursday to stop trying to overthrow its neighbor and accepted a framework for seeking reconciliation.

Although specific language remained to be worked out, North Korea also pledged to renounce terrorism and to work toward uniting millions of Koreans separated since the Korean Peninsula was divided after World War II.

Officials of both sides hailed the agreement as historic and expressed hope for more progress at the next round of high-level talks in Seoul in December. But differences between the rivals are wide-ranging, and mutual distrust is deep. Negotiations on a single document could take many months.

Both Koreas have been under pressure from their allies to defuse tensions on the heavily militarized peninsula long considered a flash-point for hostilities in northeast Asia.

It was the second move toward peace on long-standing Asian conflicts in as many days. On Wednesday, the four warring factions of Cambodia signed a peace treaty that is designed to end a 13-year-old civil war and bring free elections under U.N. supervision in 18 months.

The Korean agreement came in talks held in North Korea's capital, Pyongyang, between the prime ministers of the two Koreas, which have been bitterly divided into Communist North and capitalist South since 1945.

"Precious momentum for a breakthrough in the deadlocked talks has been generated," South Korean Prime Minister Chong Won-shik said at dinner Thursday, according to South Korean pool reports.

Chong and his North Korean counterpart, Yon Hyong Muk, presided over two negotiating sessions. The breakthrough came at an unscheduled working meeting early Thursday in which both sides agreed to a framework and some key items for a comprehensive accord on easing tensions.

"I believe that the South and North have now opened the door wide for an end to their long-standing mutual mistrust and confrontation," said Chong, who is to return to Seoul, the South Korean capital, on Friday.

Ahn Byong Su, spokesman for North Korea, described the developments as "very positive."

"It gave us hope that there will be progress at the next meeting," he said.

The agreement covering reconciliation, non-aggression, cooperation and exchanges would be the first major agreement between the two nations. If formally signed, it could lead to talks on arms reductions, a peace treaty and unification.

The key to the breakthrough was an agreement by North Korea to drop a demand that South Korea repeal laws restricting contact with the North.

Parents' visit begins today

Chimes Junior Honorary, Alumni Association schedule weekend celebration

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian Reporter

A lot of room-cleaning and bed-making will be going on before the weekend as parents pay their children a visit.

Parents' Weekend

Information on Parents' Weekend activities will be available from 9 a.m. to 12 p.m. Saturday, Oct. 26 in the K-State Union.

Parent's Weekend 1991, organized by Chimes Junior Honorary and the Alumni Association, begins today.

Crystal Harding, junior in speech and Chimes programming chairwoman, said the group has been planning the weekend since they became members last April.

"It's wonderful for the students and the parents," Harding said. "It gives them a chance to do things together and have a good time."

The theme, "From Roots to Wings," has been used since the early 1980s, said Larry Erpelding, director of resident institutional agriculture and former weekend coordinator.

Becky Klingler, Alumni Association director of constituent programs, is in charge of the project. She said the theme was created by former Chimes member Hodding Carter, and it stresses the two things parents give their children.

The Alumni Association has taken an active role in coordinating this year's weekend, and Klingler said she hasn't had a problem planning the activities.

Chimes has done an excellent job of publicizing the weekend, she said. The group revamped past methods and received a lot of support from community merchants.

"We divided up Manhattan, and each group within Chimes had a certain area," Harding said.

'Chop' doesn't defame

This will probably cost me some humanitarian-of-the-year votes, but here it goes:

The Tomahawk Chop must stay. If you've watched any of the World Series, you know what it is. If you've seen the nation's best college football team, you know what it is. If you've been out to Cico Park on a Friday night to watch the local high school football team, you ...

You get the point. It's a fad. Yet the Chop — a repeated extending of an arm to a tribal drum beat — has struck a nerve with several groups of Native Americans. Their protests have captured public attention on both the local and national level.

What fans perceive as a rally cry at sporting events has been interpreted as defamation of a race by many Indians across the country.

The protesters' view stimulated a lot of thought. Their debate that racism and disrespect for minority groups are integrated into all age groups of society cannot be ignored.

But the Tomahawk Chop a symbol of hate? Not in these eyes. Several Indians have expressed their feelings to the media. They've said the actions of fans of the Atlanta Braves, Florida State Seminoles and Manhattan Indians have hurt them.

Players from the Kansas City Chiefs recently dressed in native attire for a poster that will raise money for charity. That, too, has received criticism.

It's hard for me to understand. The Indian culture is an amazing part of the world around us. It is filled with tradition and rituals, and encompasses a group of people who have survived a rugged history.

Unfortunately, the understanding of that history has not been pounded into the generations of survivors who tried to take it all away.

I will admit that when I left of the movie theater after seeing "Dances With Wolves," I was mad at my own race. To see people with the same color of skin destroy others who looked different caused a guilty-by-association feeling.

It's a feeling that doesn't exist when the Braves are on television.

Whether you're an Atlanta fan or not, it's impressive to see more than 50,000 fans doing the same thing. When you figure all the factors that helped the Braves reach the World Series, fan spirit is a contributor.

That was evident in a TV shot of Pittsburgh pitcher Bob Walk during the National League Championship Series. Walk, who used to pitch for the Braves, appeared to be in a trance as he watched fans perform the Chop as he prepared to pitch.

Walk had probably never seen that kind of support when he pitched on several losing Braves' teams.

The protesters are also hoping to get several teams to change their mascots, including the Braves. It shouldn't be an insult. Teams choose mascots that are either representative of their geographic location or an image it hopes to portray.

Indians, Braves, Warriors and Redskins capture the competitive nature of athletic teams in battle, just like Railroaders, Cowboys, Cornhuskers and Boilermakers.

Maybe the offended groups should understand that an athletic event is an established forum for behavior that is uncommon in everyday life.

A fan yelled, "Suck it up, defense," to K-State players during a goal-line stand at KU last year. It drew laughter from surrounding Jayhawk fans.

He later tried to figure out a place he would use a similar phrase outside of a football stadium. He couldn't. The same applies to the Tomahawk Chop.

There are many symbols of racism in the world. The Chop isn't one of them.

Buffs ready for new Cats

Colorado shoots for 18th straight Big 8 victory

DAVID SVOBODA
Sports Writer

Add Colorado coach Bill McCartney to the growing list of those who have notice of the K-State football team's recent accomplishments.

Though he was seemingly less than impressed by Coach Bill Snyder's squad prior to the year — he said K-State would have to "play up" to join the four other teams as a member of the second division in the Big Eight — McCartney now appears to be singing a far different tune.

Wonder if that has anything to do with the team McCartney's Buffaloes will face Saturday?

McCartney and his Buffs, 4-2 overall and 2-0 in the Big Eight, come to Manhattan and KSU Stadium for a 1:10 p.m. contest, and they do so with a healthy respect for the team they'll face.

"Kansas State is vastly improved," McCartney told the media gathered at his weekly press conference Monday in Boulder, Colo. "I think Bill Snyder deserves all the credit that you can possibly give him."

"To have them playing as competitively as they are right now, in the time that he has been there, is a tremendous accomplishment."

K-State is, indeed, coming off one of the most impressive accomplishments in the recent history of its football program — a thrilling 38-31 loss to national power Nebraska. The Wildcats are also 4-2 overall, and now 1-1 in league play.

The Cats are about to enter game two of a three-game stretch that finds them across the field from each of the league's big boys. K-State survived the first week, even though it lost.

And the Cats impressed McCartney in the process.

"There wasn't that much discrepancy between the two teams," McCartney said of K-State and Nebraska. "And with us, there isn't either."

That remains to be seen. This is the same Colorado unit that handed the Cats their worst defeat of 1990, a 64-3 thrashing in which Tate Wright's second-quarter field goal accounted for K-State's only points.

The Buffs did lose several players to graduation, as Snyder noted before the season, but they return the glue of their offense: Heisman Trophy candidate Darian Hagan.

It's Hagan, the quarterback/punt returner/pass receiver rolled into one, whom Snyder believes makes the diversified Buff offense go.

"When the decision was made that, to win the national championship, Colorado was going to have to throw, Hagan was prominent in that choice," Snyder said. "And they are throwing."

"That puts a tremendous amount of pressure on the defenses they face. The balance in their offense makes them unpredictable."

Though K-State has worked to achieve some of the same balance

Snyder has grown to respect in the Buff attack, McCartney pointed to the Cats' wideouts as the most impressive portion of the K-State offensive arsenal.

"They're running the ball well and controlling the ball extremely well," McCartney said. "And their receivers were ranked sixth in the country and first in the Big Eight — and they look to be that good."

"Their passing game is directed by an experienced kid, and he played extremely well against Nebraska."

Paul Watson did just that. The fifth-year senior threw for 340 yards against Nebraska, and he now ranks as the top Cat quarterback ever in passing efficiency.

Snyder is proud of Watson's development.

"He's always been a confident youngster," Snyder said. "I think he's developed and come along just like you would like your quarterback to do."

"I think he's developed a strong degree of toughness, which is real important at that position."

And while K-State and Watson showed a great degree of that toughness at Nebraska, Colorado raised a few eyebrows of its own last Saturday, downing Oklahoma 34-17 in Norman.

"There is no question that, with such a young team, this year's team was in transition," McCartney said of his Buffs. "But to be able to come back and beat a quality opponent like that speaks well for the chances that this year's squad has now."

Indeed, if Colorado is to defend its Big Eight title, the road will go through Manhattan. And this is a definite full stop, not the pit stop it has been over the last few years, McCartney admitted.

"I look for a tough, hard-fought game in Manhattan," he said. "And I think Colorado has to be a better football team this week."

Refund offered

The K-State ticket office has announced it will refund $9 to those students who purchased season football tickets and have already purchased season basketball tickets.

Originally, the Department of Intercollegiate Athletics and the athletic ticket sales committee created a system designed to alleviate the need for camping out for basketball tickets. Ticket buyers are offered a discount "package", if they buy season tickets for both sports.

"We regret we made an error in our ticket-sales procedures," said K-State athletic director Milt Richards. "We apologize to the season-ticket holders and appreciate the student seating committee for bringing this oversight to our attention."

To get the $9 refund, students must bring their fee receipts and their Game 8 basketball ticket to KSU ticket offices located at Ahearn Field House or Bramlage Coliseum between now and Nov. 5.

Transfer expected to help

Altman says Nickerson key player

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Slam It with the Cats, formerly known as Midnight Madness, annually provides fans their first glimpse of the coming season's basketball team.

The top attraction of the pre-season fling for hardcore basketball enthusiasts is the opportunity to see new additions in action for the first time. It's probably the only time all season K-State fans need programs for anything but to shower the court with paper airplanes.

Other than a few pre-season reports and announcements of signings during recruiting, fans are usually unfamiliar with the newcomers.

But as 5,000 K-State faithfuls awaited the appearance of the 1991-92 version of the Wildcats Thursday, the hottest topic of conversation was a newcomer — juco transfer Gaylon Nickerson.

Though most had never seen Nickerson in uniform, they had heard plenty. Rumors, accolades, scouting reports and statistics all provided K-State fans with high hopes for the Wichita North graduate before he even set foot on the court.

Nickerson signed with the Cats after a season at Butler County Community College, where he helped the team to a 23-6 mark and a No. 15 ranking in the national junior college poll. Along the way, he posted marks of 20.3 points, six rebounds and five assists per contest, and he earned the honor of Basketball Weekly's juco player of the year.

Such brilliant reviews have caused K-State fans and coaches to have uncommonly high expectations of a newcomer like Nickerson. Coach Dana Altman, however, said he doesn't think he or the fans are expecting too much.

"Gaylon is a very talented player, and it's going to be very important for him to step up right away," Altman said. "Some of our other junior college players we may be able to bring along a little bit slower, but Gaylon's someone we need to step in right away."

Nickerson, however, downplays his role this season. He stressed it is crucial for him to fit into K-State's system rather than take too much upon himself.

"A lot of people are trying to put pressure on me, but I try to take it in the right way so that it won't cause any commotion between me and my teammates," he said. "I feel like I'm fitting in real well. I just want the team to really mesh together and play well."

K-State's 1991 recruiting class has been ranked with the best in the nation, largely due to four junior college signees, each of whom received All-America recognition last season. National recruiting analyst Rick Ball called the junior college recruiting class signed by Altman the best in the nation.

But relying upon junior college players can be hazardous. As Altman acknowledged, it often takes juco transfers time to make the transition to Division I and find their place in a system built around four-year players.

Nickerson may make that transition more smoothly than normal, though. Before starring for one year at Butler County, Nickerson spent his freshman season as a part-time starter at Wichita State, proving himself at the Division I level with 10.3 points and five rebounds per game with the Shockers.

"Obviously, he comes to us with outstanding credentials," Altman said. "He had a great career at Butler, but he also has that Division I experience, which can be very valuable to his adjustment."

Spikers get Big 8 win

Cats dump Tigers in 4 games, to face Oklahoma Saturday

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

It was a long time coming for the K-State volleyball team.

The Wildcats returned from Columbia, Mo., Thursday with their first win in the Big Eight Conference after six unsuccessful attempts.

K-State beat the Missouri Tigers in four games, 8-15, 15-11, 15-3 and 15-8, to improve its season record to 10-14. Missouri fell to 5-16 overall and remained the league's only winless team in conference play at 0-6.

The Cats' offense struggled in the opening-set loss. K-State's leading hitter on the season, Angie McKee, was out of form with a hitting percentage of .156 in the match.

McKee's troubles were duplicated by the rest of the Cats early on, as K-State managed just nine kills in 44 attempts. They committed 10 errors.

On the other side of the net, Missouri made just four miscues, allowing them to win the first set.

In the second game, K-State's offensive line evened the number of kills and errors, which was good enough to win the set. In the final two games, K-State used consistent play to finish off the Tigers. The Cats committed just six errors after tying the match and shut down Missouri's offense.

Stephanie Liester and Rhonda Hughes were effective on both offense and defense. Liester had 11 kills and 12 digs, while Hughes scored 10 kills and 12 digs.

The Cats also pressured the Tigers' defense with a season-high 14 service aces. Alison Mott and Kathy Saxton led the team with four each.

Saxton's total gave her 37 aces on the season, putting her back on top of the league leaders in that category. Colorado's Staci Wolfe had 36 heading into Thursday's action.

Missouri's Shelly Lowery was the Tigers' top player with 20 digs.

K-State's victory kept the door open in its bid for a Big Eight Tournament berth.

The Cats will look to take an additional step Saturday when they play host to the Oklahoma Sooners at 7:30 p.m. in Ahearn Field House.

Oklahoma, which beat K-State 15-

7, 15-13 and 15-13 earlier in this season, will play KU tonight.

K-State coach Pati Hagemeier said the loss against the Sooners provided some bright spots for the Cats.

"The last time we played Oklahoma, I thought we controlled the ball a lot better than they did," she said. "After losing to them, my team walked away and said, 'We can beat these people next time.'"

"I hope we can go out there and prove that Saturday."

The Sooners will be in better shape than the Tigers were. Coach Miles Pabst's team, which is 2-3 in conference and 10-11 overall this season, has two of the league's top offensive players on its roster.

Gretchen Anderson leads the Big Eight in kills, and senior Susan Musgrove is third with a .325 hitting percentage.

Pabst said Musgrove is a player who can suit the leadership role.

"She is always a positive force out on the court," Pabst said. "That has a positive impact on the way our team performs. She is a big reason we've been on a tear the last three weeks."

The Sooners recorded seven straight wins earlier this season before losing to Colorado.

CPR training classes can save lives

Students also learn signs, prevention of oncoming heart attack, Keagle says

KIMIS TIMOTHEADIS
Contributing Writer

Anyone can learn how to save someone's life — it only takes a few hours.

Stephanie Keagle, senior in accounting and American Red Cross instructor, said CPR is easy to learn. "It doesn't take much time, and the steps involved are very easy," she said.

Cardiopulmonary resuscitation is a method of putting air into a person and circulating oxygen. It is used when a victim's heart has stopped beating. Keagle said this is called cardiac arrest, which is different from a heart attack.

People never know when they will need to use CPR.

"You can be eating lunch at the Union one day. Someone can start choking, and you will use it right away," she said.

The American Red Cross offers three kinds of CPR training.

One class covers adult, child and infant skills; the second covers just adult skills; and the third covers infants and children.

"A lot of people are overwhelmed because there is so much information. But we try to give anyone enough time to really practice, as far as the skills go, on the mannequins," Keagle said.

"It is ingrained in your mind, and you remember how to use those skills when you need to."

CPR training can teach more than the skills, she said.

"We also put emphasis on prevention, like some certain factors you can have control of — your weight, your diet or whether you smoke."

People also learn the signs of an oncoming heart attack. This way, Keagle said, the patient can be taken to a hospital for medical care before he or she goes into cardiac arrest.

"Then, of course, the survival rate is much greater," Keagle said.

American Heart Association statistics show if CPR is started within the first minute after the heart has stopped, the person has a 98-percent chance of survival.

"If CPR used, chances within the first four minutes are high," Keagle said. "By the eighth minute, the survival rate is about 11 percent."

Thomas Payne, junior in life sciences, learned CPR when he took an emergency medical technician class.

"It is very easy. It doesn't take much time, and the steps involved are very easy," he said. "It could become even more effective if people in society, besides ambulance service people, knew CPR."

Larry Couchman, director of the Riley County Emergency Medical Service in Manhattan, said every workplace should have someone trained in CPR.

Technicians in ambulance service use CPR about once every two weeks to save someone's life, he said.

Yugoslavs agree to cease-fire; fighting continues

By the Associated Press

ZAGREB, Yugoslavia — Serb-dominated Yugoslav forces pounded Croatian defenses around the Adriatic jewel of Dubrovnik on Thursday and captured a key resort just to the south before a cease-fire in the area was announced.

European Community observers said federal army and Croatian defense officials agreed to the cease-fire in the Dubrovnik region, effective early Thursday evening.

Fierce fighting was reportedly continuing elsewhere in secessionist Croatia. Radio Zagreb said two civilians were killed in clashes that appeared to signal the collapse of a EC-negotiated truce for the republic as a whole that went into effect Saturday.

Croatia declared independence from Yugoslavia along with Slovenia on June 25, but Croatia's ethnic Serb minority wants no part of an independent Croatia. The federal army has sided with the Serb rebels. More than 1,000 people have died in the fighting.

In the latest battles, Croatian defense officials said the federal army resumed shelling of the eastern Croatian stronghold of Vukovar.

In a no-man's land outside Vukovar, dozens of unburied corpses of both Croats and Serbs lie on a dirt track leading through cornfields, gnawed on by stray dogs and hungry pigs.

Karlovac, 30 miles southwest of Zagreb, came under fire from multiple-barreled rocket launchers, Croatian defense officials said, and Zagreb radio reported fierce fighting on the central front near Pakrac, 70 miles southeast of the Croat capital.

One villager was killed and several wounded in nearby Prekopakra, and another civilian was killed in Daruvar, just north of Pakrac, it said.

Shelling was reported in Osijek, 140 miles east of the Croatian capital, and fighting was reported near the strategic town of Sisak, directly south of Zagreb, and near Vinkovci, a Croatian town 10 miles west of Vukovar.

Earlier in the day, after one failed effort, federal forces made a successful amphibious assault on Kupari, a resort four miles south of Dubrovnik, both sides said. Zagreb radio said federal army troops had advanced on land to within 2 1/2 miles from the east as well.

Refugees fled the hillsides and suburbs around the city, and were taking sanctuary in the city's historic heart, said EC observer Simon Smits. Croatian officials said shelling of the Adriatic port continued from the land and sea.

EC monitors, angered by the federal attacks on Dubrovnik, summoned Gen. Andrija Raseta, deputy commander of the fifth federal military district, to their Zagreb hotel headquarters for an explanation Thursday morning.

Raseta immediately agreed to a cease-fire, Smits said.

Croatian National Guard commander Imre Agotic later discussed the proposed truce around Dubrovnik with EC officials, while all three sides — Croats, federal forces and the EC — met to discuss the suggestion in Dubrovnik itself, Smits said.

Formal agreement to the cease-fire was obtained from both sides late in the afternoon.

The shelling virtually cut routes north out of Dubrovnik's center, said Associated Press photographer Karsten Thielker. Damage to the ancient heart of the city was relatively light, Thielker reported by telephone.

Residents have been without power, largely cut off from the outside world, and some kinds of food are growing scarce. People collect drinking water at pumps and taps around the city and wash their dishes with seawater.

An army statement released in Belgrade on Thursday said 11,500 women and children have so far been evacuated to Split, 90 miles up the coast.

Arabs form united front

Palestinian radicals opposed to Madrid peace talks

By the Associated Press

DAMASCUS, Syria — Arab parties to the Middle East conference reached a united hard-line stand on Thursday, but Palestinian radicals opposed to the talks seized the Lebanon offices of the PLO's main faction.

The dissidents were members of PLO chairman Yasser Arafat's mainstream Fatah faction. One Lebanese security source said the bloodless insurrection in the Lebanese port of Sidon was tantamount to a coup d'etat against what he called Arafat's policy of succumbing to pressure to attend a peace conference.

In Damascus, meanwhile, Syria, Egypt, Jordan, Lebanon and members of the Palestine Liberation Organization staked out a hard-line position for the talks after hawkish Israeli Prime Minister Yitzhak Shamir said he would attend the peace parley.

Middle East update

■ Arab parties to the Middle East conference reached a united hard-line stance on Thursday.

■ The united front ruled out separate treaties with Israel, demanded a halt to Jewish settlements in the occupied territories and insisted Israel negotiate on the status of Jerusalem.

■ Israel has repeatedly said it will not discuss Jerusalem or the settlements.

The united front ruled out separate treaties with Israel, demanded a halt to Jewish settlements in the occupied territories and insisted Israel negotiate on the status of Jerusalem.

Saudi Arabia and Morocco, which will attend the Oct. 30 conference in Spain as observers, backed the decisions by the front-line Arab states. Sources said the decisions were galvanized by Shamir's decision Wednesday to supplant his relatively dovish foreign minister and lead Israel's delegation himself.

Israel has repeatedly said it will not discuss Jerusalem or the settlements, and Israeli media reported Thursday that the Israeli delegation now would be stacked with hard-liners.

They included confidants of Shamir, hard-line legislators from his Likud bloc and possibly a representative of Jewish settlers in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip, the reports said.

The prime minister's move threatened to split his government, the most right-wing in Israel's history. Levy met with Likud supporters on Thursday, and some backers said the foreign minister would now wage an all-out campaign against Shamir for leadership of the party.

One of the Arab conference sources in Damascus, speaking on condition of anonymity, said the participants had differed widely on some points, but after Shamir's decision they felt their best stand would be "total harmony." The source spoke on condition of anonymity.

Professor charts AIDS drug

New peptide compound may curb memory-loss side effects associated with AIDS

BEN FRISCH
Collegian Reporter

A new experimental compound called peptide T may have a beneficial effect on the memory problems associated with AIDS patients, said Dr. B. Vitiello, psychiatrist at the National Institute of Mental Health.

Dallas Johnson, professor of statistics, is one of two statisticians in the country chosen to monitor the research of the peptide T compound.

"The drug could possibly slow down or even eliminate the mental degradation in people with the HIV infection," Johnson said.

Johnson spent several days last week at the Los Angeles County Medical Center where the research is being done.

"The group is supposed to meet twice a year, but we have already met four times, Johnson said.

"My job is to make sure that data is collected in such a way that the desired information will be available," Johnson said. "I am by no means an expert on the drug. The statisticians are just supposed to guarantee the validity of the study."

The study consists of two subject groups. One group is administered the drug, and one is used as a placebo.

Both groups are put through extensive psychiatric tests to measure their mental capabilities. After these pretests, the actual tests begin. Throughout the process, the patients are checked for progress.

Only the head of the project, who distributes the drug vials, knows the difference between the test group and the placebo group.

Johnson said the research team has had difficulty recruiting patients.

"The patients can't be intravenous drug users, which is the case in a number of AIDS cases. Transportation in Los Angeles is a problem, and most people don't want to ask their boss for time off," Johnson said.

Officer Krupke has a few words with members of the Sharks after breaking up a fight between them and a rival gang, the Jets, in Thursday night's performance of "West Side Story" in McCain Auditorium. "West Side Story" will be performed again today and Saturday at 8 p.m. in McCain.

'West Side' opens full speed

Production features dancing, screaming, fighting

MELISSA PETERS
Collegian Reporter

McCain Auditorium was quiet on that Wednesday evening.

Few lights were left burning in the halls, and only an occasional student could be seen wandering through the corridors. No one could have imagined what was going on behind the double doors that led to the stage.

Inside those doors, lights were shining bright, music was playing, students were dancing, screaming and fighting. No, this wasn't an average night class. This was the rehearsal for Leonard Bernstein's "West Side Story."

The curtain was drawn to reveal the cast of the show working with Diane Woodward on one of the many dance scenes in the show.

Woodward, assistant professor of speech and professional dancer, is doing the dance choreography for the show.

Backstage, individual cast members were rehearsing their lines, practicing fight techniques with other cast members or trying to catch up on some of the homework they had missed by being part of the show.

In the aisles, though, is where the real action was taking place. Fists were flying and punches were being thrown as J.R. Beardsley, professional fight choreographer, showed members of the Sharks and the Jets, the two gangs in the show, how to fight.

Beardsley said his goal is to produce a fight scene that looks realistic but is executed in such a way that no one is hurt.

"Everything you see is real," Mark Mathies, junior in criminal justice, said. "The knives are authentic, and a starting gun is even being used."

"You've really got to shut up and listen. It moves fast, and everything has to be timed perfectly."

"This is a highly intense production," said Kevin Kelly, senior in church music and theatre, joining the group of cast members sitting in the audience. "It's such a rush. Everybody gets caught up in the choreography, so you have to learn to maintain control."

Rehearsals for the show began in September, and there were many non-theatre majors in the show.

"It's a real melting pot," Kelly said. "Some of the cast includes bakery science majors, agriculture majors and journalism majors."

Kelly said it was interesting because everybody looks at the show from a different viewpoint.

Energetic choreography highlights weekend play

REVIEW

Excellent choreography was definitely "West Side Story's" strongest quality. Powerful movements throughout the play brought forth every emotion of fury, love and shame.

This modern-day "Romeo and Juliette" tells the story of forbidden love between races.

The play was excellent before it even began due to the colorful scenery. The stage was covered with dull tones, splashed with vivid colors of red, yellow, blue and hot pink. This went hand-in-hand with the characterization of the Jets and the Sharks. The Jets were dressed in dull tones of black and the Sharks were dressed in bright, flashy colors. Maria and Tony symbolized the pure peacemakers dressed in strictly white. One downfall of the costuming was the lack of consistency in timeliness. Some costumes were straight out of the fifties, while others resembled more of a Madonna look. However this was easily overlooked.

With superb choreography and terrific scenery the KSU Theatre and the Department of Music's presentation of "West Side Story" left little to be perfected. However, the characterization and music were equally well done. The play held an unmistakable energy throughout the first and second half that is particularly credible for a college production.

Theater's offering brings back traditional style

REVIEW

I used to sit and watch television a lot with my grandpa and every time we would watch an old movie — be it John Wayne or James Stewart or Abbott and Costello — and he'd always say, "They just don't make 'em like that anymore."

I used to chalk it up to nostalgia or senility — the ramblings of an old man. Imagine my surprise a few days ago, when those same words came out of my mouth after watching John Wayne epic "Red River."

And again Thursday night, I walked away from "West Side Story," teary-eyed and boring my companion with all the blow-by-blow details of the Natalie Wood film version, I had to actually stop myself from saying: "They don't make 'em like that anymore."

Maybe the old guy knew what he was talking about.

"West Side Story," playing all weekend at McCain Auditorium, is only about the most wonderful experience in the world. I've suffered through dozens of really, really bad high school and community theatre productions of the show, simply because I just loved it so much, I'd have gone to watch Divine (as Maria) and Richard Nixon (as Tony), just to hear them sing "Maria" and "Tonight."

This is what the theater used to be before all the postmodern, quasi-structural, Marxist-Feminist-Freudian-Dada-Deconstructionist improvements to the art world.

Shows like "West Side Story" make it clear that they really don't make 'em like that anymore.

New network TV not like the past

ABC, CBS, NBC short on quality programming, long on bad ideasPAT WALLECK
A&E Writer

After hours of zipping through seemingly endless television channels with the remote, I came to one strong conclusion. Turning on prime-time network television is like turning on a vacuum cleaner — they both start sucking.

Television during the last few years has changed dramatically. With an increase in the number and the quality of cable channels, networks have suffered substantial revenue loss, and the quality of new shows is more than poor.

I don't know if this is a direct reflection of revenue loss, or just bad programming choice.

More than 10,000 ideas are considered each year for the new season. Out of those, only 10 make it to production. And out of those, only three or four are actually put on the air.

I guess this is how such intelligent shows like NBC's "Blossom" get on TV. The network executives actually tossed out 9,999 other ideas and thought "Blossom" was the best. Anybody want a job in network programming? The competition can't be too stiff.

There are only a few prime-time network shows worth watching. "Cheers," "Night Court," "L.A. Law" and "Unsolved Mysteries" round off NBC's best. Otherwise, stay off of this network.

CBS also only has a handful of quality prime-time shows. "Murphy Brown," "60 Minutes" and "Designing Women" are their best bets. ABC, which is currently the number one network by the Nielsen ratings, offers "The Wonder Years," "Roseanne," "Anything But Love" and "Monday Night Football."

What's my beef with TV you ask? Simply this. These shows are all wonderful, but they've been running for more than four or five years. All of the new shows are horrible. And the good shows are spread out through the week so that TV viewing has become a finger exercise with the remote.

I even knew a woman who lost weight getting up to change the channels because her remote control broke. Handy new diet tip.

Since revenue for TV has gone down, the good shows are spread out to boost sales and viewership of the new, less-popular shows. Gone forever are the power line-up nights.

Remember Tuesday nights on ABC? "Happy Days," "Laverne and Shirley," and "Mork and Mindy" all in one evening. I never had my homework done on Wednesdays in grade school.

Who could forget the ultimate power line-up on Thursday nights on NBC in the mid-1980s? "Cosby," "Family Ties," "Cheers," "Night Court" and "L.A. Law" all in the same evening. Simply incredible.

Metal band scores another grunge hit

ROD GILLESPIE

"Badmotorfinger" isn't quite an appropriate title for Soundgarden's latest album. It should be called "Badmotherf-er."

With this release, Soundgarden has eviscerated the grunge metal genre, holding up the entrails for all to see.

Since its earliest recordings, Soundgarden has been an icon for garage thrashers everywhere. Apparently, being an icon wasn't good enough for this band.

Indeed, the band has improved its lofty status by expanding the boundaries of grungedom.

Where much of the band's previous music featured primal, from-the-gut songwriting and arrangements, "Badmotorfinger" bristles with highly developed musical patterns and textures. Several cuts feature saxophones and trumpets. The band took a chance, but it worked — Soundgarden has decided to use subtlety instead of a chainsaw.

Each song features complex time signatures and musical excursions. The fifth cut on the CD, "Face Pollution," provides an excellent example of these "songs within songs."

This jazz influence is also evident

Does the future of the grunge genre lie in horn sections and jazz riffs? Probably not. In all likelihood, the future of the genre will depend on where Soundgarden decides to take it.

'Deceived' doesn't deceive

Suspense film's theme proves a real treat for viewersJENNIFER BEALS
A&E Writer

Damian Harris has joined the recent surge of suspense films with his latest offering, "Deceived."

"Deceived," starring Goldie Hawn and John Heard, is the story of an art restorer (Hawn) who discovers that her late husband (Heard) was not who he appeared to be.

Heard ("Home Alone") gives an excellent portrayal of the cold-hearted, malevolent husband. He not only kidnaps his own daughter, but he murders a member of his own family without blinking an eye.

Heard shows that he is a flexible, talented actor as well. In "Home Alone," he was a caring, lovable father. However, in "Deceived," he spins a web of deception that tricks the audience in believing he is good, when in fact he is so horrid it's frightening.

Hawn, in her first serious role, shows she can be very versatile. In most of her films, Hawn depicts lighthearted, free-spirited women ("Bird on a Wire," "Overboard").

In "Deceived," Hawn displays a mature, intelligent woman who begins to fit the pieces together. As Hawn's character fights for her life, the viewer witnesses just how truly sharp she really is. In fact, Hawn would even give old Sherlock a run for his money. One interesting aspect of this film is the cinematography. In practically every scene the backdrop is surrounded with dark tones. Many of the pieces of art deco that dot the background add a cold, uncomfortable tone to the movie. As in any thriller, there are also plenty of dark halls and feet shots.

The only really unfavorable comment to make about "Deceived" is the element of suspense. There isn't any. Harris throws in a few surprises for good measure but never really enables the viewer to grab the seat with white knuckles.

On the whole, "Deceived" is a good movie. The acting is superb, and the scenery is great. This film is one of the better movies out right now and shouldn't be missed.

Millions to perform at Wareham

HEATHER ANDERSON
A&E Writer

Intensely laid-back.

The Millions, an Omaha-based band, will perform tonight at the Wareham Opera House. The group features a frenzied, energetic quality in its music which is usually only achieved by thrash or punk bands.

But as a pleasant twist, the musicians are always in control of the sometimes-mellow sound.

And if the stage show is any bit as polished as the album, the audience is in for an incredible night.

Those who aren't into the usual grind scene at the Wareham might try the show as a fresh alternative to Top-40 cover bands. Usual Wareham-goers will enjoy as well. And fans of VH-1-type sounds will appreciate The Millions for the controlled sound while getting a kick in the butt at the same time.

Delivering a youthful message

35-year-old priest takes over the pulpit at St. Isidore's Catholic Church

HILARY GANT
Collegian Reporter

St. Isidore's new priest is learning to play racquetball and likes to tell good jokes, but his real passion is helping people.

The Rev. Keith Weber, at the age of 35, has been the priest at St. Isidore's University Chapel since July 1. Besides being the parish priest, he is also in charge of the Catholic Campus Ministry.

Weber said his role is to bring people closer to God. His age is both a help and a hindrance when working with students, he said.

"Hopefully, the students feel I can relate to them. I went to school here and experienced a lot of the same problems the students do. I can empathize with them."

"The hindrance is that sometimes people are looking more for a dad-type figure. I'm not old enough to be a dad to any of these students," Weber said.

College-age parishioners said they appreciate his positive attitude toward students.

"He really tries to relate to the college crowd," said Mark Schreiner, senior in English education.

Eduardo Arce-Diaz, graduate student in economics, said Weber is both inspiring and encouraging.

"The fact that he is young helps. He is approachable and easy to communicate with," Arce-Diaz said.

"It's good that people question what they believe and why they believe in it."

The Rev. Keith Weber

Co-workers say Weber is organized and has a good sense of humor.

"He is enthusiastic about campus ministry and enjoys a good laugh," Sister Rose Walters, CSA, said.

Students said the humor in his homilies helps him drive messages home effectively.

"He usually has a joke for an introduction, but it has something to do with the homily," said Brian Timberlake, senior in biology.

A Salina native, Weber graduated from K-State in 1977 with a degree in accounting. He worked in a certified

MIKE WELCHMAN/Staff

Rev. Keith Weber, K-State graduate, took office July 1 as the new pastor at St. Isidore's University Chapel located on the corner of Denison and Anderson avenues. Weber replaced Rev. Norbert Diabai, who was transferred to Tipton, Kan.

public accounting firm for a year before going to the seminary in St. Louis.

"The more I worked at the accounting firm, the more I looked forward to my free time when I could go out and do people-oriented things," he said. "Finding a reward in helping people was very important to me in my life, so the profession of the priesthood was a very viable option."

But his decision to enter the priesthood was not easy.

"Giving up my income was difficult, and the issue of giving up being able to get married was difficult. Those were the things I struggled to let go of when I went to seminary," Weber said.

He spends his days with the people now.

His duties include daily mass, premarital counseling, teaching classes to people who want to become members of the Roman Catholic Church and talking to students about personal problems and matters of faith.

"It's good that students question what they believe in and why they believe in it," Weber said. "If they question it, they come looking for answers. That's the best because they can get their questions answered. I think just to question isn't enough."

The biggest challenge students face today is sharing their faith with others, Weber said.

"I think people are very vocal against other people witnessing to what they believe in. To be a witness to your faith is difficult today."

U.S. economy weakens

Orders for durable goods plunge, unemployment rises

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — Factory orders for durable goods plunged in September for the second straight month, and claims for unemployment insurance climbed to the highest level since May in what analysts cited as fresh signs of a weakening economy.

"If you wanted to shift the tea leaves in the most optimistic way, there's not much to make you feel good," said Joel Prakken, an economist with Laurence H. Meyer & Associates, a St. Louis forecasting service.

The Commerce Department said orders for durable goods — usually expensive items expected to last more than three years — fell 3.2 percent, to $121.5 billion, paced by the steepest decline in defense orders in more than seven years.

Orders also sank a revised 4.1 percent in August, to $125.5 billion, worse than the previously estimated 3.9 percent drop.

"September orders for durables reveal a recovery that is still on the skids and shows few signs of strength," said economist John M. Albertine, head of a Washington forecasting company.

"This gloomy-looking figure, in conjunction with other statistics such as higher unemployment claims ... indicate the sustainability of the expansion is in question," said Sung Won Sohn, an economist with the Norwest Corp. in Minneapolis.

The Labor Department said Thursday that new applications for unemployment insurance rose 29,000, to 452,000, during the week ending Oct. 12, the highest level since May.

And the Federal Reserve said

Wednesday that a survey by its regional banks pictured a "weak or growing slowly" economy in September and early October, with manufacturing "still improving although at a slower pace in some areas."

"So far, industrial production really has been the main source of economic strength," Sohn said. "But this durable goods report indicates that production may not go up and may falter."

The Federal Reserve survey also found the Boston and St. Louis regions "noted growing weakness in defense industries" — a finding reflected in the durable goods report.

The often-volatile defense orders plummeted 48.9 percent, the steepest drop since a 51 percent decline in April 1984. Orders totaled $5.5 billion, the lowest level since falling to $5 billion in November 1990.

Some analysts said the reduction in defense spending associated with the end of the Cold War would continue to plague the manufacturing sector.

"It's part of a trend," Sohn said. Excluding the defense category, orders rose 1.1 percent.

The transportation sector, which also varies widely from month to month, sank 13.9 percent, to $29.6 billion, on top of a 9.1 percent tumble in August. Excluding that sector, orders rose 0.9 percent.

The report said decreases in aircraft, shipbuilding and tanks offset an increase in motor vehicles.

But the automobile industry reported steep declines in sales during the first 20 days of the new model year, October. Many analysts expect auto sales to remain weak and thus curtail new orders.

Shipments of durable goods increased 0.7 percent to $125.3 billion, the sixth consecutive increase, although the level remained below the $127.7 billion posted a year ago. Still, the report said orders for non-defense capital goods excluding aircraft rose 8.2 percent, to $26.9 billion — the biggest gain since a 9.6 percent advance in January 1989. This gauge of business plans to expand and modernize fell 2.1 percent a month earlier.

Among the major orders sectors, primary metals also fell 5.1 percent, to $10.7 billion, after dipping 1.6 percent the previous month.

But orders for electronic and other electrical equipment rose 8.6 percent, to $17.6 billion, wiping out a 7.7 percent loss a month earlier.

Kansans lack sexual dialogue

Discussion among parents, teens urged by researchers

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

Communication about sex is lacking with rural Kansas teen-agers, both among themselves and with their parents.

Howard Barnes and David Wright, professors of human development and family studies, recently surveyed Kansas teens and sexuality, using students in grades seven through 12 and parents of kindergartners through 12th graders.

"What we really tried to do with the study is address some gaps in the literature available related to adolescent sexuality issues," Barnes said.

Most current material was researched on college campuses, in urban areas, at family planning clinics or with teen-agers who were already pregnant. Barnes said this neglected kids in rural areas or those who had taken planning steps, such as visiting a clinic.

Barnes said he and Wright looked at more than the sexual activity of teens, and their study sets a broader context for understanding adolescent sexuality and family attitudes.

The team found Kansas teens' level of sexual activity was consistent with national averages.

Barnes said the typical age at which kids lose their virginity is 14 or 15. About 50 to 75 percent of the students said they were currently sexually active.

However, many of their experiences were casual, not part of long-term relationships, which Barnes said surprised him.

Too often, people only focus on the study's statistics of sexual activity, he said. The accompanying issues of communication and relationships are just as important.

If divorce rates and teen-age pregnancy bother people, Barnes said,

Teen sex facts

- Teenagers typically lose their virginity at 14 or 15 years of age.
- Fifty to 75 percent of students surveyed said they were sexually active.

they've got to start educating kids about relationships.

"There's no forum there for them to talk through these relationship issues," he said.

For the past three years, the state Board of Education has mandated that all public school districts provide comprehensive sexuality and AIDS education for students in grades K-12.

However, this does not mean students are required to take the courses. Barnes said it is also up to each district to define "comprehensive," so there is some inconsistency throughout the state.

Manhattan High School Principal Jim Rezac said freshmen and sophomores have sexuality units in health courses.

Three weeks of the freshman course are spent on human sexuality. Rezac said the program covers the reproductive system, pregnancy, contraception, parental responsibility, relationships, rape and sexually transmitted diseases. Special attention is devoted to AIDS, he said.

"Of course, AIDS is an STD, but we spend comparably more time on it than other STDs," Rezac said.

Sophomores spend two to five days in physical education class discussing acquaintance rape. He said this was more timely in 10th grade, because that's when most students begin to date.

"We spend quite a bit of time on communication between dating partners (in both classes)," Rezac said.

Students may choose not to take the courses. Only about 3 percent opt out, and it's usually the parents' decision.

Koplik

"No matter what shape it is in the final outcome, the board cannot escape the paper's conclusions," Koplik said.

A major issue for debate in the statement is a passage that calls for a program to be evaluated for termination if its student numbers are below a certain level.

The passage bases a quota on the number of undergraduates and graduates in a certain program.

If that portion of the plan was kept intact, several programs at K-State would be in jeopardy, most notably human ecology and architectural engineering.

Sampson denied the board was looking into terminating those programs or planning to merge them with other schools.

"We have no plan at this point regarding those programs," Sampson said. "We're not going to take any action concerning any program until we do some more consulting and review that program."

K-State President Jon Wefald said

despite rumors to the contrary, the architectural engineering program was not now and never would be in danger.

"We have one of the finest programs in the country," Wefald said. "Architectural engineering will be here forever."

Among other subjects discussed with K-State administrators, Sampson said, was the K-State administration's dedication to the expansion of the Farrell Library.

"We saw that the library was moved up in priority, and we asked why, and we discussed that," Sampson said. "I was really surprised to hear the acquisitions made by the library had increased so dramatically that something had to be done. The need for expansion is absolutely critical."

Although Sampson and Koplik support the idea of state aid for the expansion, the board does not have a say in the allocation of money to that end, Wefald said.

The current plan for expansion funding is for $5 million to be raised through alumni contributions, $5 million from a student referendum and $18 million from the state, Wefald said.

Rape

to "get clean" again. Some women fear the attacker will return, or, if she reports him, he will retaliate.

Acquaintance rape victims regularly experience guilt and shame, feeling they did something to bring on the attack.

Robertson said he tries to reinforce that the rape wasn't the victim's fault and get her to realize a crime was committed.

"A person has been forced to do something that has damaged her self-respect," he said. "There is a feeling of being dirty or bad."

A woman who knew her attacker may even feel concerned and won't want to make his life difficult by reporting him. Here again, Robertson said he tries to drive home the fact that the rapist's actions were wrong, not hers.

Anger is a necessary part of the healing process, he said, but it won't come unless preceded by a feeling of loss, then hurt.

"When one is attacked, there is a real sense of loss that's immediate," Robertson said.

"It's terribly healthy to somehow find that anger."

As a relative, friend or lover of a rape survivor, Robertson said, it's important to let her talk to help her recover.

"The reason a person tells (about the rape) is not to get answers," he said. "The reason a person tells is to be understood, to be validated and believed."

Longer-term effects of a rape include eating and sleeping disorders, fears of being alone or in crowds, distrusting the motives of friends and being paranoid of strangers.

The victim's closest relationships may also be damaged in ways that are hard for those involved to understand, Robertson said. She may find it difficult to be close to or trust people.

The Ms. Magazine Campus Project on Sexual Assault found that many rape survivors suffer from post-traumatic stress syndrome, which is also common among war veterans.

Robertson said syndrome symptoms include jumpiness, inability to concentrate, a loss of interest in once-favorite things, memories of the attack that come at unwanted times and thoughts of suicide.

The Ms. project found 30 percent of rape victims contemplated taking their own lives, 31 percent sought therapy, 22 percent took self-defense courses and 82 percent said they were permanently changed by the attack.

Rape survivors may contact UCS for personal counseling at 532-6927.

McClure leads a sexual assault support group at the Crisis Center, which meets for nine weeks, two or three times a year.

Group therapy is geared more toward people whose attacks occurred at least a year ago, McClure said.

There is no group currently meeting, McClure said, but call 539-2785 for information on starting one.

While his transition to K-State may be eased somewhat, Nickerson has yet another adjustment to make. The 6-foot-3 junior has spent his career at the off-guard or small forward spot. With a wealth of players who are neither pure point nor off-guards, Nickerson has spent the fall working at the point position.

While a prolific scorer throughout his career, Nickerson considers the manner in which he handles the point-guard position as his most important contribution to the team.

"I feel more comfortable at the off-guard," Nickerson said. "It (the transition to a new position) is going pretty well. It's getting better, and I'm feeling more comfortable all the time."

Whether Nickerson occupies the point or shifts to the off-guard spot, Altman said the team's guard play will be improved. Equally interchangeable at point and off-guard are senior Marcus Zeigler, juco transfer Vincent Jackson and freshman Brian Henson.

"To be a competitive team, you must have good guard play, and I think we'll be much improved over last year," Altman said. We'll have much better depth and have the ability to score a little bit more. We had trouble shooting the ball, and I look for Gaylon and Brian and Vincent to provide some of the shooting we haven't had."

The experience has made her a little skeptical of the system.

"Now that I've been through this, I'm going to have to always watch my back and make sure things are the way they're supposed to be instead of just taking them for granted," Anderson said.

As a result of the error, a student who did withdraw from the University is still enrolled.

"Somewhere out there is a student who did withdraw and leave the University thinking that he or she withdrew," Hauck said. "But I can't believe we haven't heard from them because they should be wondering where their refund is."

Foster said it's anybody's guess who that student is.

"Whenever we find out who that student is, we'll complete the withdrawal, and they'll be given their refund," he said.

Anderson said she still can't believe this happened to her.

"It's been very stressful on me," she said. "I feel sorry for the person in the future who may have to go through this because it's not a fun thing."

"You get tired of explaining it constantly."

Hauck said there is no real system of double-checking things before they are finalized.

Senate

Engineering Senator Neil Neaderhiser, proposed a motion to refer the EOF allocation back to the committee for the amendments to be discussed in committee meetings.

"I have this fear that this Senate meeting is going to turn into a huge committee meeting, last all night and we're going to allocate more money than we have in EOF," he said. "We're not going to get very effective things done. It's going to be patchwork legislation."

Neaderhiser said he proposed the postponement because it was unfair that the groups had no appeals process besides the amendments.

Business Senator Derek Nelson said arguing the amendments on the floor is the appeals process.

"It may not be very wise or very efficient, but it's all we got," he said. Batchman said his committee would need input from the groups and senators before any changes to the allocation bill could be made.

"I better have notes in my mailbox saying why this bill was bad, otherwise we don't know which way to go," he said.

Nelson said it was ironic Senate always stresses deadlines.

"What's the one group that can't meet the deadlines? Senate," he said.

Honorary paints K-Hill letters

The going is slippery and steep for Steve Liang, senior in electrical engineering, as he falls while painting the 'S' on K-Hill Sunday afternoon as his co-workers watch. The whitewashing of the letters was done by members of Tau Beta Pi engineering honorary, who have been doing the job since the letters were made in the 1920s.

Painters go out on a rope for group project

ROY GRABER
Collegian Reporter

K-State engineering students went out on a rope Sunday afternoon to paint the "KS" letters on K-Hill, east of Manhattan.

Tau Beta Pi, a group of engineering honor students who demonstrate academic and service excellence, used this project as a group membership requirement.

Fifty members gathered to remove brush, scrape rough edges and cover graffiti.

"Tau Beta Pi is an honorary group that expresses both service-mindedness and integrity," said Marc Scarbrough, junior in electrical engineering and Tau Beta Pi member.

"This project is building traits that the complete engineer should have, and we're getting the chance to know each other better."

Painters whitewashed the letters with a mixture of limestone, cement and water. More than 600 gallons of water, 1,180-pound bags of limestone and nine 100-pound bags of cement were used to cover the letters which rest on the hill at a length of about 40 yards. The project took three hours to complete.

The group emphasizes trust. Much of the trust building came when the painters were suspended by a rope down the hill, which is at a 60-degree angle and hundreds of yards from the ground below.

As those at the top poured down whitewash, the painters used brooms and paint brushes to cover the letters with it. The remaining workers mixed up more paint and held the ropes.

"That's some massively hard work, but it's also a lot of fun," said Steve Liang, senior in electrical engineering and Tau Beta Pi member. ■ See HILL Page 10

Economic conditions may raise crime rate

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — The amount of crime reported to police rose 2 percent in the first half of 1991, the FBI said Sunday.

And some criminal justice experts say weak economic conditions may be a factor.

Violent crime reported to law enforcement agencies increased 5 percent compared with the same period last year, while property crime edged up 1 percent, the FBI said.

About 16,000 law enforcement agencies across the country supply information for the FBI's crime index. The agency did not provide a state-by-state breakdown.

The FBI report comes on the heels of a household survey released a week ago showing that overall crime for 1990 declined 3.9 percent. That household survey issued by the Justice Department is considered a more accurate reflection of crime trends because it measures crime generally, not just crime reported to police.

Less than 40 percent of major crimes are reported to police.

According to the FBI index, there was a 3-percent decline in the Northeast in the amount of reported crime in the first six months of 1991. But there were increases elsewhere: 4 percent in the Midwest, 3 percent in the South and 2 percent in the West.

The increases have some connection to unemployment and drug addiction among poor youths in the most crime-prone age group, ages 15-24, said Gene Stephens, professor of criminal justice at the University of South Carolina.

The youths' situation — never good — is worse with the economy in the doldrums, Stephens said.

The data released by the FBI does not break down crime statistics by age.

There were indications in the Justice Department's household survey that crime might be turning up, said Alfred Blumstein, dean of the school of urban and public affairs at Carnegie Mellon University.

For example, robberies in 1990 were up sharply, by 5.3 percent.

Economic recession can tend to drive crime rates down in some categories, Blumstein said.

Many people are home more, which can lead to less household crime such as burglary. Attempted forcible household entries, larcenies and car thefts were down sharply last year.

The FBI said in the first six months of this year robberies reported to police were up 9 percent. Other violent crime categories rose as well: murder, 5 percent; rape, 4 percent; and aggravated assault, 2 percent.

Also during the first six months: In property crimes, there was a 1-percent increase in each of three categories: burglaries, larceny-thefts and motor vehicle thefts. Arson showed no change.

Additionally, through the first half of the year: The nation's biggest cities showed a 2-percent decline in reported crime.

Bush faces challenge in negotiations

Middle East seeking to end conflict; formal talks with Israel first in 42 years

By the Associated Press

WASHINGTON — After finally coaxing warring parties to the Middle East peace table, President Bush faces a much tougher job: keeping them

No one has ever been able to do it before, and the odds are still stacked against success.

There have been five full-scale wars between Arabs and Israelis, with thousands of casualties on each side. The Middle East nations have never been able to sit down for a successful peace conference.

The region has become a graveyard for peace proposals.

But Wednesday in Madrid, all of Israel's Arab neighbors, including the Palestinians, will be engaged in formal direct negotiations with the Jewish state for the first time in 42 years.

Bush and Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev, as co-sponsors, will open the conference with speeches intended to put intense international pressure on the parties to negotiate seriously.

By itself, the meeting at the 18th-century Royal Palace is a remarkable achievement for Bush and Secretary of State James Baker. It took eight trips by Baker to the Middle East just to arrange the conference.

Bush has much invested, but said he believes it's worth the risks. The ■ See CONFERENCE Page 10

Oozeball discontinued due to upcoming sale of land

Reorganization sought by Student Foundation members

KIP BEASLEY
Collegian Reporter

There will be no Oozeball this year.

A proposed reorganization of the Student Foundation and the upcoming sale of the land owned by the KSU Foundation has left the organization's mud volleyball pits dry and full of large cracks.

The annual tournament, previously held in conjunction with the Student Foundation, was discontinued last spring. The KSU Foundation will be selling the land at Claflin and College avenues where the mud pits are dug.

The Student Foundation is proposing its own reorganization to the deans of the eight colleges. Beginning in 1981, the group has helped the KSU Foundation muster support and raise funds for the University.

"The reorganization is due to a large move by the KSU Foundation to become more constituent-orientated," said Kara Belew, president of the Student Foundation.

As part of the reorganization, a new constitution was drawn up and the membership policy was changed. The constitution acts as a discipline measure for attendance, duties, application and responsibilities for members, Belew said.

In the past, membership was open to anyone. In the proposed membership policy, it will be limited to ambassadors and volunteers.

Deans from the eight colleges would nominate two to four student ambassadors to represent the college on the Student Foundation, said Bill Manning, KSU Foundation constituent-development officer.

A total of 32 ambassadors, plus six officers to be elected later by the retiring officers and the new ambassadors will make up the group.

Students will also be selected represent McCain Auditorium, University Libraries, the art museum, Intercollegiate Athletics and K-State-Salina, Manning said.

"One of the KSU Foundation's goals is that the ambassadors serve as a missing link between the Foundation and the colleges," Belew said. "In previous years, the fund raising for the colleges has been done mainly by the dean and faculty. The students really haven't been involved."

Ambassadors would represent their college or institution to assist in Telefund, Books and Bricks Library Campaign, All-University Open ■ See OOZE Page 8

Indoor marijuana-growing scheme busted

TOPEKA (AP) — A federal grand jury has returned indictments against a Lawrence man in a drug case involving an indoor marijuana-growing operation.

Vincent Anthony Perdue was indicted for possession with intent to distribute 544 marijuana plants and possession of a firearm in connection with a drug trafficking offense, U.S. Atty. Lee Thompson announced Tuesday.

An Oct. 8 search of Perdue's residence by the Kansas Bureau of Investigation revealed an indoor marijuana-growing operation and several firearms, Thompson said.

If convicted, Perdue faces a maximum sentence of life imprisonment and a $4 million fine on the marijuana charges and five years in prison and a $250,000 fine on the firearms charges.

Brent Anderson, first assistant U.S. attorney, said Perdue was not in the state's custody. Perdue was expected to make a voluntary appearance in federal court in the next few days for formal arraignment.

Bumbling bandit bungles bounty

HUTCHINSON (AP) — A man might have pulled off a convenience-store robbery had he not accidentally stabbed himself in the face, dropped the cash register he had taken and allowed himself to be corralled by passers-by, authorities said.

The 18-year-old man was arrested at 8:15 a.m. Thursday and was taken to Reno County jail. He had not been charged Friday afternoon.

The suspect stabbed himself in the face, apparently by accident, when he cut the power cord of a cash register at a Zip Trip convenience store, police said. He then fled the store and dropped the cash register and a knife outside. The suspect was not seriously hurt.

The man apparently ran in front of a car driven by Bruce Kelley of Hutchinson and was chased into an alley, where a girl stopped him. The suspect fled as police approached but was soon caught, Kelley said.

Freak accident ends Christo's exhibit

FORT TEJON, Calif. (AP) — Workers furling environmental artist Christo's giant yellow umbrellas Sunday following a freak accident that killed a woman visiting the exhibit.

Christo ordered all 3,100 umbrellas — 1,760 yellow ones in California's Tejon Pass and 1,340 blue parasols in Japan — closed after the accident Saturday evening, bringing a tragic ending to the three-week spectacle.

The project was scheduled to close

Wednesday.

"It's disappointing, but naturally our true and utmost feeling is one of regard for the woman who has passed away and her family," said project spokeswoman Chris Pennella.

Authorities identified the victim as Lori Rae Mathew, 33. She died when wind gusting to 40 mph blew one of the 485-pound umbrellas across a road, crushing her against a boulder, authorities said.

Two others were treated for minor injuries, authorities said.

Gunshot victim to undergo surgery

A K-State student is scheduled to undergo surgery today at Memorial Hospital for a gunshot wound he received early Sunday morning in Aggieville.

At 1:24 a.m., Previn Araujo, freshman in business administration, was shot in the right calf outside of Bushwacker's, according to Riley County Police reports.

Wade Bainum, junior in history pre-law and Araujo's roommate, said the surgery was to remove the bullet still lodged in his leg.

"I was gone all weekend," he said Sunday. "I didn't even hear about it until this morning."

Two suspects were arrested in the incident, RCPD Sgt. Larry Freeby said.

Michael C. Arceneaux, HHC 4th/AVN Brigade, Fort Riley, was arrested for aggravated battery and carrying a concealed weapon. He is confined at the Riley County Jail on a $10,000 bond.

Lawrence E. Ballard, HHC 4th/AVN Brigade, Fort Riley, was arrested for carrying a concealed weapon and was confined on a $1,000 bond. He posted his bond around noon on Sunday, said Levi Collins, RCPD Correction Officer.

"He had to bond out and was turned over to the military police," he said. "That's our policy."

Fort Riley officials were unable to comment about the incident.

Winning surprises honored parents

JENNIFER RICHARDS
Collegian Reporter

The first Larry Viterna heard of the contest was when he got a phone call at work that proclaimed he and his wife, Marty, had won.

"We were definitely surprised," Larry Viterna said. "We had no idea she even entered the contest."

The Topeka couple's daughter, Jocelyn, freshman in business administration, submitted an essay explaining why she thought her parents should be honored as the 1991 K-State honorary parents.

Honorary parents are selected by Chimes Junior Honorary through an essay contest. They represent the moms and dads of 21,507 K-State students.

The couple received a plaque during halftime of the Parents' Day football game against Colorado Saturday afternoon.

The Viternas also have a son at K-State: Joel, junior in hotel and restaurant management. Jocelyn and Joel are Manhattan High School graduates.

In February, Larry Viterna became executive director of USA Funds-Kansas Program, a non-profit guarantor of student higher education loans. The new job forced the family to move from Manhattan to Topeka this past summer.

He was director of the student financial assistance office from 1986 to 1990. Marty Viterna worked at Manhattan's Pawnee Mental Health Center until the couple sold their home to move to Topeka.

Jocelyn Viterna said her parents taught her and her brother that all life is a lesson, and while some lessons are painful, they should look for the good

Jaw problems stem from excess use

Syndrome often missed as cause of headaches

CHRISTINE VENDEL
Staff Writer

Unexplained headaches, reduced jaw mobility and facial pain may be caused by excess muscle activity from chewing things such as gum, ice and hard candy.

HEALTH

Although it is quite obvious jaw problems might stem from severe jaw trauma such as a vehicle accident, a blow from a fist or prolonged jaw hyperextension, the seemingly harmless act of chewing plus habits such as sleeping on one's stomach or leaning on one's chin can also contribute to a jaw disorder.

The disorder is known as temporomandibular joint syndrome.

The temporomandibular joint may also be referred to as the jaw joint, and is located just anterior to the ears.

TMJ syndrome can manifest itself in a wide variety of ways: popping or clicking in the ears with jaw movement, pain in the jaw joint, pain in the jaw muscles and other areas of the face, locking of the jaw in an open or closed position and perhaps most commonly, headaches.

Dr. N. Lee Smith, Salt Lake City, Utah, wrote, "Probably the most missed diagnosis in headache patients is common TMJ syndrome."

Melinda Rippee, senior in elementary education, said she found out she had TMJ syndrome last summer when her jaw locked open while she was at work.

"My jaw stayed locked open for about five minutes," she said. "I didn't know what was happening. It's really scary."

Rippee said as a result of the incident she contacted a doctor who later diagnosed her as having TMJ syndrome.

JAWS

Most people take the temporomandibular, or jaw joint, for granted. But trauma to this joint can be the cause of headaches, lockjaw, jaw popping or teeth grinding.

PLAYBOY'S PHOTOGRAPHER IS HERE AND INTERVIEWING

Playboy's photographer is now interviewing female students attending Kansas State University for a spring Playboy pictorial on Girls of the Big Eight Conference.

This celebrated annual pictorial features a different college conference each year, and has become one of the most popular and talked-about magazine features in the country. Since Playboy's first college pictorial 14 years ago, nearly 12,000 coeds coast-to-coast have tried out. Many have gone on to become Playboy Playmates, actresses and models.

If selected, you will be paid a modeling fee, be interviewed by the media, be featured at autograph sessions and have the time of your life with the celebrity status you will gain from your appearance in Playboy.

To qualify, you must be 18 years of age or older and registered as a full- or part-time student at a Big Eight* University. Interested students may call to attend the interview sessions taking place at the location listed below.

OPINION

It's high time middle class gets a break

Already planned defense cuts could mean a tax break for the average American.

Comparing the U.S. economy to something "dead in the water," the chairman of the Senate Finance Committee on Sunday proposed using defense savings to cut taxes for middle-income persons by $72.5 billion over the next five years. The senator said it could "jump start" the economy.

Sen. Lloyd Bentsen, D-Texas, said the tax cut would be paid for by a 5-percent cut in defense spending over the next five years. Last year's budget agreement limited use of any savings from reductions in military spending to cut the federal deficit, but savings can be used to ease the financial burden placed on middle-income families. The proposal would take effect Jan. 1, 1992.

Considering that the gap between the middle class and the upper class keeps widening as the rich get richer and the poor get poorer, it seems a tax break is well-deserved.

Middle-income families are finding it harder and harder to get by, even when both spouses are working.

It could be argued that all Americans deserve this tax break because all Americans pay for our country's defense and all benefit from it.

But the rich don't really need a tax break, and the poor have programs geared to help them. The middle class doesn't have that.

And too many times, someone has to be "dirt poor" to receive assistance. The middle class, too often, is told to "pull yourself up by your bootstraps."

Sen. Bentsen is proposing giving middle-income Americans the chance to get ahead for once, and then maybe they will be able to give something back to the economy that gave something to them.

Let's be good sports about war at game

K-State has a long-standing tradition of honoring the armed forces during its football games. On Band Day, for instance, troops from Fort Riley fire the big guns as high school bands from across the state play the "1812 Overture."

And for a great portion of K-State's modern history, the school has honored troops through an Armed Forces or Army or Fort Riley Day. This year is no exception.

Fort Riley troops will be here Nov. 16 for the K-State-Missouri game, as will 1st Division equipment. The troops will also bring equipment they captured from the Iraqis.

As big of a tradition as Fort Riley Day has become, and as important as Fort Riley and the money it brings in are, bringing captured Iraqi equipment to K-State — a college that is trying like hell to be diverse and give equal opportunity to all — is in poor taste.

Fort Riley soldiers went to Iraq. Fort Riley soldiers did their job. Fort Riley soldiers came home.

If Saddam Hussein were to show off captured equipment of ours during whatever sport Iraqis play, we would call it evil or, at the very least, propaganda.

Many Manhattan residents and many K-State students are proud of what the soldiers did over there. Some people aren't. And some people that live here are Iraqis.

Fort Riley soldiers should be honored at the game. We just hope they leave the Iraqi equipment in Fort Riley.

We won the war. Now let's be good sports about it.

The making of History

Statue quietly stands test of time

ED SKOOG

Eighty years ago today (that would be Oct. 28, 1911), this campus was visited by a number of important men, none of whom photographed nude cuties or ran for president.

They spoke at the unveiling of the William Alexander Harris Memorial Statue in front of Fairchild Hall. A partial list of those present includes Rev. A.E. Holt, K-State President Henry Jackson Waters, J.F. True, Capt. J.G. Waters, Secretary of the American Shorthorn Breeders' Association B.O. Cowan, U.S. Senator Edwin Taylor and Commander R.T. Bean of the United Confederate Veterans of Wichita, Camp 1350.

The statue is still there, shrouded in a mist of spruce and, to the west, overshadowed by an even stranger statue of a tapeworm.

William Alexander Harris was born in Loudoun County, Va., in 1841. He served in the Confederate Army in Stonewall Jackson's command. He emerged from the war as an engineer-captain, but the title of "Colonel" clung to him throughout his life, sort of like Col. Mustard.

In 1865, he came to Kansas. He was a railroad man for a while, but in 1876, he began his career as a breeder of shorthorns. He was a regent of the agricultural college. From 1897 to 1903, he served in the U.S. Senate. He died Dec. 20, 1909, a senator and a colonel. Today we'd probably add, "He was at Woodstock and marched at Selma."

Eighty years from now, no one will understand that remark either.

The time-capsule urge is silly. One age's trivia does not hold lasting interest for another, despite the proliferation of antique malls. Memorials are a manifestation of the time-capsule urge. Whatever the intended message, it is diminished once cast in bronze. Have you ever tried to walk in bronzed baby shoes?

In 1911, the speakers expressed hope the Harris memorial would remind future generations, such as ours, of

Bill and Ed in front of Fairchild Hall.

Harris' shining example. An editorial in The Kansas Industrialist the same day said, "No boy or girl in the future can pass between Anderson Hall, the seat of college administration, and the library without viewing the testimonial bestowed upon a gallant soldier, a statesman of merit, a farmer and breeder of national repute ... The world is not ungrateful. It admires manly men, and Senator Harris was a notable type in that category."

Well, it didn't quite work out that way. When I point out the statue to people, they say, "I always wondered what that was." The thing seems filed away and forgotten, the way it hides in the spruce bushes.

I first noticed the statue last winter during a snowstorm. I was on campus late on a Sunday night. It had snowed all day. I think it was January. All the buildings were locked, and I wanted to get out of the snow. I couldn't see where the sidewalk began. I ran into something marble. I looked up and saw the bust of Harris, like an angel in the night. Above the bronze bald head was a strong branch of spruce, which kept the memorial shielded from the snow.

I brushed the snow away from my face, smoked a cigarette to warm up my lungs, thanked the statue, then launched myself back out into the cold world. I don't think that's what the speakers meant in 1911, but then, given 80 years, irony is bound to grow between what you meant and what your actions did.

"Men accustomed to writing confessed themselves unable to say whether Senator Harris, in history, should be noted most for his military services, his accomplishments as a statesman, or his undoubted success as a breeder of fine shorthorn cattle."

The Kansas Industrialist, October 28, 1911

Time changes everything, as the old Texas Playboys song goes. Is it today that the Hefner Playboys are running around campus lifting up ladies' skirts? Or is that next week? All these dates run together this time of year with such austere visitors coming to our campus.

Wednesday, October 30, 1991, Virginia governor and presidential candidate Douglas Wilder will give a Landon Lecture. A few weeks ago, Sen. David Boren, imaginably a future presidential candidate, was here to tell us what is wrong with our generation.

That's the difference between our campus visitors in 1991 and those of 1911. The unveilers of the Memorial saw a better future, while Boren predicts a chaotic welfare state. Wilder will probably be equally uplifting.

But even if this is true, there is hope. If the expectations of the 1911 speakers didn't come to pass, perhaps 80 years from now someone will dig up the Landon Lecture transcripts or the 1992 Playboys "Girls of the Big Eight" issue and almost understand how far wrong we were.

LETTERS

'Metalhead' criticism not opinion of all

Editor,

Obviously, Frank Sereno doesn't "know about the rest of the University," or he wouldn't have even bothered to write his extremely biased letter. Hey, Frankie, who died and made you God?

If you'd take some time out of your protesting life and listen to the lyrics of the bands you're condemning, you'd find — to your surprise — that most of them are against "war, death, murder, bodily harm and Satan."

And where are your statistics that show radio shows like KSDB-FM 91.9 "Metalhead" promote drug use and cause students to drop out? These are often contingent on the family of the dropout or drug user, not the music he or she listens to. I admire Mr. Crow and DB92 for having the guts to play what no other station in the area will dare play. Certainly, for some, it's a welcome change from Wilson Phillips, MC Hammer or Amy Grant. If you didn't like "Metalhead," why didn't you just change the station? Imagine that, Frank, you can actually change the station.

It's called freedom of choice — one of the basic principles this country was founded upon. Men have even died so you can have this right. Look it up in the library if there are any left when you've finished burning all the books.

Surely you know that phrase in the Bible that goes, "Judge not, lest ye be judged thyself."

If not, allow me to translate. Before you take a walk in my world, go take a walk in the real world.

Nolan Schramm

Collegian. As was stated on Page 4 in the editorial box, Monday marked the beginning of BrotherPeace Week, a week dedicated to the need for putting an end to violence against women. The editorial stated, "People know the problem of violence is out there. And they want it to stop."

The irony is just one page earlier. There was an article devoted to praising the "survival game" in which people play with "carbon-dioxide powered gun with paint-filled balls as ammunition."

I realize that in the paint-war games, no one is meant to be actually injured. I realize that this game is commonly considered a sport, and to some people, it may actually be a lot of fun. But despite the fact that participants don't use red paint, people need to consciously realize this is not actually a game of survival. It is simulated murder.

At a time when society is so desensitized to the horrors of violence, it's not surprising that games such as this evolve to reflect the very reality, which we don't take all that seriously. It's not surprising that teamwork starts to resemble gangland destruction.

What BrotherPeace Week is all about, I believe, is to not simply take our attitudes and activities as a given. What are we actually depicting and promoting with our games? With our lifestyles? Couldn't we be putting our energy into activities that have more constructive value that help put an end to violence?

I don't have any exact answers. I don't know if anyone does. But I do know that we need to become aware of the ironies and continue asking the questions.

Crazy ideas make letter funny

Editor,

This letter is in response to that of Frank Sereno concerning the KSDB-

FM 91.9 "Metalhead" program article. I do not think the article was a waste of paper, and, luckily, I do not think Sereno's letter was a waste either. Actually, it was good, clean, comical entertainment. How could the author of such a composition accuse another group of being "lame, immature and naive?"

It is obvious that Sereno meant to say "my paper," instead of "our paper." That letter contains the most selfish and immature set of ideas I've ever encountered.

When are you, Frank, going to "wise up" and realize the Collegian is informative, not critical, and that not everyone is going to like your self-righteous music? I thank God this nation is democratic enough for me to listen to whatever kind of music I want and to allow me to vote so that I can help keep closed-minded individuals such as yourself from occupying a public office.

I'm sure Andrew Crow respects many types of music and would agree with me when I say that music having a direct link to death, murder, bodily harm, Satanism and the promotion of war is completely erroneous.

And as far as burning anything is concerned, I wonder if Sereno approves of burning the U.S. flag or the Bible. I will bet not.

Let's face it, Sereno. What this nation needs is less of you. Ultimately, you and people who think like you are the reason the Ku Klux Klan, Nazi youth, book banning and gay bashing exist. You're the reason the horseradish sauce at Arby's is mild. You promote a watered-down and undiverse society.

My advice to you, Mr. Sereno, is to pick up a U.S. Constitution and read it — twice. Who knows, you may find out you don't know everything.

Pageant helps promote unity

Black Student Union ambassadors chosen in contest

DEBRA MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

Four students vied Saturday for the titles of Mr. and Ms. Black Student Union 1991.

John Kitchings, senior in psychology, and Michelle Redmond, freshman in pre-medicine and sociology, won the seventh annual pageant, which was in the K-State Union Little Theater.

This year's theme for the competition was "Challenges for Excellence in the 1990s."

In addition to Kitchings and Redmond, Ira Wright, freshman in music education, and Lafern Watkins, sophomore in theater, entered the contest.

"Ira Wright and Lafern Watkins were really good competitors. It was tough going up against them," Redmond said. "However, I am glad that I won, and I hope that I can make a difference."

Mr. and Ms. BSU are the organization's ambassadors to the Big Eight conference. They are supposed to promote unity within BSU, as well as make it more visible on and off campus.

Redmond said one of her goals as Ms. BSU is to recruit more members to strengthen the group.

"I would like to make the BSU more visible on campus, and I intend to show my fellow students that it's a worthwhile organization," Kitchings said.

The contestants were judged on talent, an essay on problems facing African-Americans and an interview.

Pageant judges were Dwain Archer, director of parking services; Paul Bridges, freshman in computer science; Anne Butler, director of educational supportive services; and Diane Caldwell, coordinator of multicultural affairs.

"I thought the talents were extraordinary," Butler said. "I hope the students will find ways to manifest their talents and leadership skills at the University."

Several multicultural faculty members said they were happy to see events like the pageant take place.

"This is just another great opportunity that's a necessity for the growth of the multicultural students in this environment," Caldwell said.

Watkins said, "It was another success. Even though there were just a few contestants, the energy and positivity was flowing through us all."

Lafern Watkins, sophomore in theater, presents a dramatic performance during the talent competition of the seventh annual Mr. and Ms. Black Student Union pageant Saturday night in the Union Little Theater. Watkins finished as first runner-up in the pageant.

Rain forest awareness programs planned

JANE ROESNER
Collegian Reporter

More than half the Earth's original rain forests have been destroyed, and Students Acting to Save a Vulnerable Environment want people to realize the ramifications.

SAVE has organized Rainforest Awareness Week for Oct. 28-31 at K-State as an extension of World Rainforest Week.

Activities will begin today with a video presentation and will conclude Thursday with a presentation by Dennis Law, professor of landscape architecture.

Stephen Johnson, graduate student in biology and SAVE member, will present a program at 8 p.m. Tuesday in the K-State Union Big 8 Room.

"My specific talk will be about the plants and animals that live in the rain forests and basically how they interact with one another," Johnson said.

It's a topic usually overlooked by non-biology majors, he said, but it is important to remind them of the significance of rain forests. Many students will eventually be in fields where they have the power and money to help, but they won't do so if they are not aware, Johnson said.

Farzana Islam, freshman in political science and SAVE member, has coordinated a new student organization, Rainforest Action Group, to extend rain-forest awareness beyond the week's activities.

"Rain forests are a very significant and important ecosystem in the world, and they're just disappearing very fast," Islam said. "One of RAG's main projects, as soon as we get established, is to do something about it."

Wilson said 50 million acres of rain forests — an area equivalent to the size of Pennsylvania — are destroyed every year. Since rain forests absorb 30 percent of all carbon dioxide in the atmosphere, their depletion is a major contributor to the greenhouse effect, he said.

If current trends continue, Wilson said 800,000 to 1 million plant and animal species will be driven to extinction by the year 2050.

Cattle ranching is the No. 1 reason for deforestation in Latin America, and it has accounted for more than 85 percent of the destruction of the Brazilian Amazon. Most of this meat is consumed in the United States as convenience foods.

Cats get their chances, but lose

SCOTT PASKE

Revenge sweet for Nee

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Nebraska basketball coach Danny Nee walked into Sunday's Big Eight Media Day conference sporting a devilish grin.

Coaches love it when forecasters are wrong. Nee let the group know it with words not fit to print.

"I think he'd been looking forward to that moment for a long time," Cornhusker senior Carl Hayes said.

Nee, who got his master's degree from K-State in 1972, couldn't keep from smearing eggs in the faces of the guys who picked his team to finish eighth in last year's preseason Big Eight poll.

All the Huskers did was win a school-record 26 games and keep the Big Eight race interesting until the final week, before finishing third behind Oklahoma State and KU.

"You guys had me believing last year that we really were that bad," Nee said. "That cost me a couple nights of sleep."

Humor was just one of the themes for the annual conference, which brought together coaches and players from all of the Big Eight teams. Coaches were full of praise for most teams except their own. Players analyzed what the league will be like without five dominant players who moved on to the NBA.

One common thought prevailed, though. With three returning starters, including preseason player-of-the-year Byron Houston, Oklahoma State is the class of the Big Eight.

Not even Cowboy coach Eddie Sutton could deny that.

"The best thing we have going for us is Byron Houston and four other seniors," Sutton said. "I told our seniors that this is their basketball team. When they all of the sudden realize that this is their final year and their team, I think they'll be excited about what we can do."

Houston, who averaged 22.7 points per game on last year's NCAA Sweet Sixteen participant, will draw everything from headlines to triple teams this year. But it may be the guys who throw the ball to him that carry the Cowboys' fortune.

"I think we will have one of the best backcourts in the country," Sutton said.

With Sutton's son, Sean, Darwyn Alexander and Corey Williams, Oklahoma State returns a nucleus that can execute the Sutton trademarks of pressure defense and a ball-control offense.

KU coach Roy Williams, whose team was picked second in this year's preseason poll, profiled his highly-touted recruiting class. Then, he took time to bash the rising popularity of recruiting with fans.

"It's got to the point where recruiting is more important than the games themselves," Williams said. "You can go 0-27, but if you had a good recruiting class, you'll keep your job."

Humor continued to be a big part of Iowa State coach Johnny Orr's presentation. Orr commented on everything from the loss of all-Big Eight performer Victor Alexander to the quality of Iowa State's 2-4-1 football team.

"When one of those guys catches a punt, the fans cheer," Orr said. "I hope it doesn't get that bad for our team."

The Cyclones, which defeated K-State twice last year, plan to fast break whenever possible.

"They'll run much more," Orr said. "They'll shoot more and they'll score more. They'll pass the ball more and they'll throw the ball away more."

Missouri coach Norm Stewart agreed that Oklahoma State should be the preseason favorite to win the title, but added, "There will be plenty of challengers. There's no rebuilding in this conference, just reloading."

The preseason poll includes: 1. Oklahoma State, 2. KU, 3. Oklahoma, 4. Missouri, 5. K-State, 6. Nebraska, 7. Iowa State, 8. Colorado.

Turnovers fatal as Buffs escape with 10-0 win

SCOTT PASKE
Sports Editor

Maybe it was when Elijah Alexander dropped Darian Hagan's errant pass in the third quarter. Or maybe it was when Mitch Berger's punt took a sideways bounce at K-State's 2-yard line.

Pick any of several plays. Each tells why K-State's second upset bid of a Big Eight giant fell short Saturday at KSU Stadium.

No. 15 Colorado was the latest to hold off the pesky Wildcats, winning 10-0 before a Parents' Day crowd of 31,987.

"It was a game where two defenses outplayed two offenses," Buffalo coach Bill McCartney said. "Colorado just did a better job of not turning the ball over."

Exactly. The Cats' loss had a lot to do with self-inflicted wounds. Two fumbles, two interceptions and two missed field goals kept K-State from avenging a 64-3 loss to last year's national champions.

But it was the location of one of the turnovers that helped the Buffs score all the points they needed.

In the second quarter, quarterback Paul Watson dropped a snap from center Quentin Neujahr. Colorado nose tackle Jeff Brunner fell on the ball at K-State's 13.

"I'll take the blame," Watson said. "It was just a flub. It happens every once in a while."

The infrequent mistake proved fatal two plays later, as CU tailback Lamont Warren skirted the left side for a 7-yard touchdown run.

"Colorado didn't score on our defense," K-State coach Bill Snyder said. "They scored on our offense."

K-State's offense had plenty of chances to make amends. The Cats marched inside Colorado's 25 on three first-half drives.

The first ended when Watson's pass for tight end Russ Campbell was intercepted by Chris Hudson. Watson threw over the middle, but Campbell wasn't looking.

"I told Russ it would be nice if he turned and looked for the football," Snyder said.

The offensive woes continued when kicker Tate Wright missed a 35-yard field goal in the first quarter. K-State drove into field-goal range later in the half, but backup Warren Claassen couldn't connect from 32 yards.

It was frustrating enough for Snyder to shuffle his weekly practice agenda.

"Anyone who has a shoe and a foot can try out," Snyder said. "I feel badly for Tate. No one works any harder, but there comes a time."

Throw in a first-quarter pass in the end zone that was just out of Michael Smith's reach and another interception at CU's 18, and the misery wouldn't subside.

For all the offensive heartaches, the Cats' defense did what it could to ease the pain. The Buffs ended with 339 yards of total offense, but Hagan, a Heisman Trophy candidate at quarterback, was held to 48 yards on 15 carries.

Buffs turn up the heat, shut down passing attack

Colorado sacks Watson 9 times, holds Cats to 78 yards in 2nd half

TODD FERTIG
Sports Writer

Paul Watson winced as he slid into a chair to field questions from reporters following Saturday's 10-0 loss to Colorado.

"A little sore?" one reporter asked. Watson just rolled his eyes and laughed.

Laughing was about all Watson could do after the game. He spent the entire afternoon fleeing the relentless pursuit of the Buffaloes' defensive line.

Colorado's defensive line was, in fact, much like a herd of buffalo. They came as a pack from all sides and angles, and couldn't be stopped.

"You have to give our defensive line a lot of credit," Buffs' coach Bill McCartney said. "I thought they put a lot of pressure on right to the last play. I think the difference in the final result was the pressure that was on Watson. That was the single biggest thing."

K-State only got six passes off in the entire second half, completing just two. After moving the ball at times in the first two quarters, the offense gained just 78 yards after halftime.

The key statistic of the contest, according to McCartney, was the nine quarterback sacks posted by the defense. The Wildcat offense lost 66 yards on the nine setbacks and saw all but three of its drives stopped more than 10 yards away from first downs.

"That was our whole game plan — to put pressure on the quarterback," said defensive tackle Leonard Renfro, who recorded three sacks on the afternoon. "We knew coming in that he is a good quarterback and had done really well in the past few weeks."

Renfro said the main advantage the Buffs' defensive line held over the offensive line of K-State was quickness. The defense relied on simple pass rush schemes and was too quick for the Cats' line to contain them, Renfro said.

While Watson was pounded for nine sacks, he was hurried or flushed from the pocket on several other occasions. For the game, he completed 13 of 26 attempts, but was picked off twice. He also was forced to run 16 times for a net gain of -17 yards.

Watson said Colorado utilized a

"We came close to shutting down one of the nation's best," nose tackle Evan Simpson said. "In order to have a chance to even be close to Colorado, you have to contain Hagan."

"But it's a loss, and a loss is frustrating."

Still, the Cats slammed the end-zone door on all but one occasion. The Buffs' other points came on a 29-yard field goal by Jim Harper in the third quarter.

"I told the defense after the game that in the time that I've been here, that's the best effort that I've ever seen," Snyder said.

The praise was hard for defensive tackle Tony Williams to accept.

"We're a team," Williams said. "You can't say the offense was bad and the defense was on the money."

It could be said for Colorado in the second half. The Buffs yielded just 78 yards after intermission and made it nearly impossible for Watson to find his receivers.

"It's hard to throw when you're running for your life," said CU de-

Larkin delivers a Series win

Old method helps Twins capture title

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — After all the twists, turns and tension, the World Series had to come down to this.

The Minnesota Twins and Jack Morris squeezed past Atlanta 1-0 on pinch-hitter Gene Larkin's single in the bottom of the 10th inning to win Game 7 and end baseball's week-long odyssey.

Never before had three Series games gone into extra innings, and the Braves and Twins saved the best for last. Both teams had chances to win it in the final innings, and when the Twins finally did, players on both sides streamed out of the dugout to embrace as the 55,118 fans roared in appreciation.

From the start, it was evident and inevitable that the first last-to-first World Series would go down to the last pitch. And it did, as for a record fourth time a game was decided on the last swing.

None of the previous 31 seventh games had been scoreless through seven innings, and not since 1924 — when Walter Johnson won it for the Washington Senators, the Twins' ancestors — had one gone into extra innings.

It was also the first 1-0 decision in Game 7 since the New York Yankees withstood Willie McCovey's line drive to beat San Francisco in 1962.

Morris lived up to his reputation as one of baseball's best big-game pitchers with perhaps his best performance ever. Pitching into extra innings for the first time since 1989, he shut out Atlanta on seven hits, striking out eight and walking one and five times escaping with Atlanta runners in scoring position.

He won for the second time in a week and improved to 4-0 lifetime in the Series and 8-1 in the postseason.

The Twins followed the same scenario as they did in 1987. They won the first two games at the Metrodome, lost three on the road and then returned home to win two and the championship. Those are the only times the home team has won every game of a Series.

Atlanta starter John Smoltz, who shut out Pittsburgh in Game 7 of the NL playoffs, also pitched well enough to win. He allowed six hits in 7 1-3 innings, but he and the Braves lost a chance for victory on a brutal base-running mistake by Lonnie Smith in the eighth inning.

Smith could easily have scored from first on Terry Pendleton's double, but he lost track of the ball and had to hold at third. Morris later escaped by getting Sid Bream to ground into an inning-ending double play with the bases loaded.

The Twins wasted a bases-loaded chance in the eighth when Kent Hrbek lined into a double play, and they left runners at the corners in the ninth when pinch hitter Paul Sorrento struck out.

Sooners rally to beat spikers

Tourney hopes fading fast for Cats

FRANK KLEEMANN
Sports Writer

It's time to pull out the calculator for the K-State volleyball team.

After failing in its attempt to post its second Big Eight Conference win and tie the season series with Oklahoma on Saturday, the Wildcats need some help in reaching the postseason league tournament.

But K-State's four-set loss against the Sooners gave the team hope for its four remaining Big Eight matches.

K-State had its share of chances, but lost 15-5, 9-15, 15-11 and 15-11 in Ahearn Field House.

"I really think we played one of our best volleyball matches," K-State coach Pati Hagemeyer said. "The first game was a kind of warm up for us. We were concentrating on coming out faster than we have done before, but we just couldn't."

"But from the second game on, my team played very strong."

The Cats also started slow in the second game, falling behind 5-1. Then, it was senior Rhonda Hughes who helped the Cats take their first lead.

With four kills and an ace, Hughes led the team to 10 unanswered points. Moments later, the Cats won the game 15-9.

With renewed confidence, the Cats returned to the court to build a 11-6 lead in the third set. Mentally ready for the next game, K-State forgot to finish off Oklahoma. The Sooners took advantage of that and rallied to win the set.

"In the third game we had a big lead, but Oklahoma caught up point by point," Hagemeyer said. "We needed just a little more excitement, a little more focus for the last four or five points to win the game."

Hagemeyer said the same thing happened in the final set, when the Cats came back from a five-point deficit to take an 11-8 lead. OU rallied again, however, and won the fourth game to improve to 3-4 in conference and 11-12 overall.

"I think we did the wrong things at critical times," Hagemeyer said.

"Oklahoma blocked us a couple of times toward the end of the match, and we passed some bad balls then. If it comes to a tight match as today and you're playing a good team, then maybe you can afford those mistakes earlier in the match. But certainly you can't afford those errors at the end."

Hughes said she thought the team played well through most of the match, but the players felt too comfortable with the leads.

"The first and final set was a little bit shaky," she said. "I think we did kind of relax. We didn't kick the intensity up to what it was. We just laid back when we thought we had the game."

Hagemeyer said her team showed good character in the final set after losing the previous game. But when it came down to big points, the Cats couldn't hit the ball around the Sooners' block.

Oklahoma's Gloria Holcomb, who made three of the last four points on blocks, and 6-foot-3 Gretchen Anderson were like a wall.

"The Sooners are big blockers," Hagemeyer said. "It's their strength. We knew we couldn't hit through them. There are some ways around them. But if you don't have that plan in mind it usually comes back at you."

Hughes turned in the best performance for the Cats, who fell to 10-15 and 1-7 in the Big Eight. She recorded 17 kills and 12 digs.

Sophomore Wendy Garrett attempts a drop shot during the Wildcats' match against Oklahoma Saturday night in Ahearn Field House. Garrett recorded 49 sets in the Big Eight contest, but K-State lost to the Sooners 15-5, 9-15, 15-11 and 15-11.

Disco rears its ugly head again

Tunes pack the dance floors, says Washington, D.C. DJ

JIM JOHNSON

Editor's note: Jim Johnson is music director for KSDB-FM 91.9.

"Play that funky music" may once again be the ritual mating call of hormone-stricken teens as disco once again rears its ugly head.

Disco is on a rebound in the States — thanks to the same Easterners who have spawned other throw-away fads.

According to my good ol' rock 'n' roll DJ buddy in Washington, D.C., Jon Paul, those old disco tunes are packing the dance floors of some of that area's hottest clubs. In fact, it's not just the clubs that are getting into the disco scene, but radio as well.

Can you imagine what would happen to the country if everything else disco personified came back into being? The very thought of a polyester suit just makes me want to puke in someone's white-leather elevator shoes.

How about seeing good old George Bush belting out "Y.M.C.A." at the Republican National Convention? Or, better yet, why don't we all dig out those bell-bottom pants for a night in the 'Ville?

There are some interesting things that have managed to stick with us since the death of disco in the 1980s.

For example, spandex. Perhaps all those masochistic, Jane Fonda workout types are closet disco fanatics, pumping 245 beats per minute through those Sony Walkmans.

Did you know Barry Gibb was recently sighted at a local Shop Quik buying a Slurpee? Apparently, he's in hiding from some record-label hitman. But the government witness protection plan does allow him access to a studio. Ahh, I truly savor the triumphant return of the Bee Gees.

With Halloween rapidly approaching, nobody will probably think anything about it. However, if you are truly a closet disco fanatic, here are a few pointers.

Remember, what starts on the coasts has to take at least three years to either cross the Mississippi River or the Rockies.

Edwin Starr died, but he lives on forever in someone's garage sale on a 25-cent eight-track tape.

Once nominated by their deans, students will remain ambassadors until the dean of their colleges revoke them, Belew said.

Although the membership policy has changed, volunteer members are still able to join Student Foundation on an associate basis.

The reorganization is to make the organization more of an honorary and to get students more involved in their college's individual fund raising, Belew said.

'Oasis' varies in its jazz style

Marienthal plays up the hopelessly romantic in new album

BETH BRADLEY
Contributing Writer

Editor's note: Beth Bradley is the Secretary for New Currents, K-State's New Age/Jazz/Fusion Music Appreciation Club.

The world of music has a variety of styles open to anyone interested. Eric Marienthal takes advantage of the variations in style. On his album Oasis, Marienthal shows us the influence that dance beats, blues and gospel had on him in his early years.

He also plays up the hopelessly romantic with a couple of tracks.

QUEST REVIEWER

The usage of voice sampling on two tracks adds to the hip-hop effect of the songs. Unless you are a good listener, the voices are easy to miss. While listening to "Seafood to Go," we get to "see" Marienthal let go; there's some definite toe-tapping going on. Interest in rhythm rather than instruments characterizes this track.

The title track is definitely a driving song, especially if you're driving a convertible. "Understanding" is a slower, more meditative selection taking the listener to a more romantic atmosphere.

"Just to See You Again" is dedicated to artists like B.B. King and Aretha Franklin, who influenced Marienthal while growing up.

"Another Shore" employs gospel singing that, unfortunately, becomes a little overwhelming.

Marienthal started his solo career in 1988 with "Voices of the Heart." This was followed by "Round Trip," "Crossroads" and, finally, "Oasis."

Marienthal has a distinctive and powerful blowing style on both alto and soprano sax. He is both versatile and adaptable.

Various artists, like Machun of Hiroshima on vocals and Russell Ferrante on keyboards, lend their talents to this album.

Overall, the album is enjoyable for relaxing and dancing. It has what it takes to excite the listener.

Diana returns with sensuality

Ross gets back to her roots with strong, resounding vocals

ROGER STEINBROCK
Collegian Reporter

It is love.

Diana Ross abandons the heavy synth, dancing drumbeat of her 1989 bomb, "Workin' Overtime," and returns to her roots on her 58th album, "The Force Behind the Power."

While other artists rely on screaming guitar riffs, heavy crashing drum beats or samples of other artists' work to guarantee success, Ross' secret is her quiet, sensual vocal quality, which comes through with a stirring powerful resound.

Her first single cut, "When You Tell Me That You Love Me," brings to mind recollections of her 1976 hit "Ain't No Mountain High Enough." It starts out quite timid and builds up to an emotional crescendo.

The song explores the mind's thoughts when involved in a love relationship. The song culminates to a very powerful, driving force in which Ross sings, "Every time you touch me/I become a hero/... I'm shining like a candle in the dark/when you tell me that you love me."

Ross doesn't sugarcoat her album with pop ballads, but adds songs dealing with the pains of love gone bad. She doesn't dwell on pain or the past, but looks to the future.

On "Battlefield," a more upbeat song, she sings, "Everything that can has gone wrong/It's gonna take some spine to carry on."

Another emotional song, "Heart (Don't Change My Mind)," shows the turmoil of struggling to get out of a loveless relationship.

The piano introduction of "Heart" gives the song a tender quality that leads an open and honest Ross talking to herself when she sings, "It makes no sense to stay/Sad that it has to end this way/It's over, it's over/Heart don't change my mind/Oh, heart, be strong this time and try to tell him goodbye."

Her remake of Stevie Wonder's classic, "Blame it on the Sun," showcases her incredible voice that at times seems only a whisper but sounds crisp and clear as she flows through the lyrics.

The album's title cut was written by synthesizer wizard Wonder. He also plays all the instruments and displays his ingenious talent of combining a difficult vocal arrangement with impressive instrumentation. The song dances on the side of gospel, and Ross' vocals are supported by the Andrae Crouch Singers.

The lyrics talk of hope and the power of love. They discuss the love of others, the love of God and, most importantly, the love of oneself.

Ross sings, "That doesn't mean you have to be a rich man/for you could be a person living on the street/But if you give only words to lift someone higher/then a heart of gold is what you will be."

"The Force" has its lapses, but Ross more than makes up for it in her incredible vocal performance. The album returns Ross to her long-standing tradition of being a master of stirring one's soul through music.

The force may have been missing from her music for the past few years, but it returns on this album showcasing the many moods of the real force behind the power.

It is love.

in experiences.

"They taught us to get along in the real world," she said.

"I remember the joy and excitement we shared at the birth of my baby sister. And I still feel the heartache of learning she had been diagnosed with cancer," she wrote. "We witnessed with pure shock the way healthy people ... stared at bald, puffy-cheeked chemotherapy patients. My little sister died shortly before her fifth birthday. Once again, Mom and Dad overcame their own sorrow to help me deal with mine. 'Always remember,' they said, 'the good that comes from the bad.'"

"He said it was caused by hyper-extending my jaw a lot, like for orthodontic work or when I got my wisdom teeth out," she said. "When you keep your mouth open like that for long periods of time it does something to your jaw."

Rippe said in addition to her jaw locking open, she gets bad headaches and her ears make a popping noise.

"When I am eating something, my boyfriend can hear my jaw popping all the way across the room," she said.

Rippe said the disorder affects her sporadically.

"If I'm really stressed out it gets bad," she said. "Being tense makes all the symptoms worse."

Dr. Larry Moeller, chief of staff at Lafene Student Health Center, agreed and said the term uptight is very descriptive.

"When you're uptight, muscles tend to contract, and that can induce a headache," he said. "We encourage stress management. We work hand-in-glove with the Counseling Center here."

Moeller said TMJ syndrome is not that uncommon at K-State.

"We get about one to three students a week with this problem," he said.

Although cutting down muscle hyperactivity is commonly recommended to help mitigate symptoms, dentists cite different reasons as to what exactly causes TMJ syndrome.

Dr. Michael Roberts, a Manhattan dentist with Sager Dental Associates, said many student patients come in with headaches or facial pain, and he attributes it to stress.

"Stress can cause people to clench or grind their teeth, sometimes when they are sleeping, and that causes morning headaches or facial pain," he said.

Roberts said nocturnal teeth grinding is more damaging.

"If you put an pressure measuring instrument in your mouth and clenched your teeth, it would be about 200 pounds of pressure per square inch," he said. "At night, it is 2,100 pounds of pressure per square inch. No one really knows why that is."

The September 1988 issue of Patient Care magazine noted that being aware of harmful habits like teeth clenching, which are often expressions of anxiety or tension, is the first step towards alleviating the pain and discomfort associated with them.

Dr. Brent Benkelman, a Manhattan oral and maxillofacial surgeon, said TMJ syndrome is multi-faceted, and individual situations cause the problems.

"If we all lived by the rule — moderation in all things — we would all be better off," he said. "The way people grow up sometimes predisposes them to jaw problems and they are more susceptible to problems from chewing gum and other things."

Benkelman also said sleeping on one's stomach cocks the jaw off in an angle which can be damaging over time.

"A lot of habits such as leaning on your chin or sleeping on your stomach also put unneeded pressure on your jaw."

Dr. Alan Wilkinson, from Louisville, Ky., has earned certificates in orofacial pain and temporomandibular disorders. He said blaming TMJ syndrome on stress is dodging the real issue.

"What is stress? It is the tensing up of a muscle," he said. "Muscle determines where teeth, and bones for that matter, go."

Wilkinson said looking beyond obvious symptoms and into the muscular issue of TMJ syndrome can head off jaw problems at the pass.

"When you are chewing gum, what are you doing? You are flexing muscle, and how do you build muscle? By repetition," he said. "This results in a constant shortening of the muscle."

Wilkinson said chewing gum, ice, mints, and hard candy chronically shortens and bulks up muscle which reduces jaw mobility and can cause the problems associated with TMJ syndrome.

He used an analogy of a bodybuilder to illustrate.

"Bodybuilders lift weights and shorten their muscles so much some of them can't even scratch their backs or comb their hair," he said.

Boyd Hall celebrates 40 years

Family members, guests gather in honor of Mamie Boyd

By the Collegian Staff

Family and guests of Mamie Boyd gathered Sunday in the lobby of Boyd Hall in honor of the residence hall's 40th birthday.

Hall President Lara Miller, junior in theater, welcomed the 21 family members who attended the commemoration in honor of Mamie Boyd. Many of her relatives are involved in the newspaper business like Boyd, who was selected Kansas Presswoman of the Year in 1957.

A. Thornton Edwards, the first director of housing, told guests how K-State residence halls evolved and how Boyd Hall was named.

Edwards served as director of housing in 1946 when K-State began building residence halls. He retired in 1973.

In those days, the University was pressed for housing, and only one apartment building was used as a dormitory. Barracks were brought in for student housing as enrollment increased.

Since those forms of housing were inadequate, Edwards said, a new goal was reached — to have excellence in housing at K-State.

Construction on Boyd began in 1951, and it made its mark by becoming the only residence hall other than Van Zile Hall.

It was first called Northwest Hall because it was northwest of Van Zile. K-State policy said a hall couldn't be named for someone unless he or she was deceased.

Home demonstration units in Kansas helped finance residence hall construction.

In 1961, Northwest Hall was renamed in honor of Mamie Boyd. She served as the first woman to lead the KSU Alumni Association and regularly attended commencement and sporting events. She also helped many students pay college expenses.

"After graduating from Mankato, Boyd sold a calf, worked in the hay field and at a newspaper to raise money for train fare to attend K-State," Edwards said.

"She went on to be a successful assistant professor of agriculture and wrote a book, which was donated to the Manhattan library."

Miller said a new portrait of Boyd will be hung above the fireplace in the lobby.

Middle East is one of the most combustible regions on the globe and perhaps the only spot that could ignite a world war.

When the talks begin, everyone will be in uncharted waters. There are no precooked results for the negotiations that follow. And there are many predictions of failure.

Despite the uncertain outcome, some view the peace talks as a no-lose gamble for Bush.

"If he fails, so has everyone else," said Stephen Hess, a Brookings Institution scholar who is a specialist on presidential politics. "If he succeeds, he might as well get out his top hat and tails to march to Stockholm to pick up his Nobel Peace Prize."

Another school of thought says the Middle East could undercut Bush's successes on other foreign policy fronts.

"George Bush has gained enormous credit from the notion that he can make things happen on the international stage," said Norman Ornstein, an analyst at the American Enterprise Institute. "If he focuses on and highlights an area where he can't make things happen, then it takes down the image of statesmanship that he so carefully built a peg or two."

Unlike Jimmy Carter, who orchestrated the Camp David peace talks between Israel and Egypt, Bush will stay on the sidelines. Officials say he will be involved, though, prodding the parties primarily through telephone diplomacy.

Polls show a large majority of Americans feel Bush spends too much time on overseas travel and foreign policy. Accordingly, he will leave Madrid as soon as he makes his opening speech, then fly to Houston to begin raising funds the next day for his re-election campaign.

Unlike 1973, there is no oil embargo or long gas lines driving the United States into deeper Middle East involvement.

The United States is trying to seize the opportunities created by the end of the Cold War and the defeat of Iraq in the Persian Gulf War.

"It's really slick and kind of dirty down there, but it's all for a good cause."

When the painting was finished, the workers looked down the hill and expressed a sense of pride and accomplishment.

"I thought it went really well," said Tim Miller, senior in computer and electrical engineering and group vice president. "We had a lot of volunteers, and everyone pitched in. That's what it's all about."

Yeltsin asks Russia for economic reform

Price, wage controls by government would be lifted; hardships temporary, says president

By the Associated Press

MOSCOW — Russian President Boris Yeltsin proposed Monday a painful one-year leap to a market economy for Russia and said the hardships consumers will suffer were better than the alternative of eternal poverty.

Yeltsin invited the other 11 Soviet republics to join his speedy reform plan, which would free state-controlled prices and privatize most businesses in Russia. But he also said Russia was prepared to act unilaterally.

He served notice that Russia would form its own army and print its own currency if other regions' increasingly aggressive independence drives hurt the largest and richest Soviet republic.

Yeltsin's timetable for economic reform was the fastest and most aggressive proposed by any level of government in the Soviet Union, including Soviet President Mikhail Gorbachev. Previous Kremlin plans to move to a market economy have fallen short because of half-hearted implementation or the refusal of the entrenched Communist bureaucracy to cooperate.

Yeltsin's blunt acknowledgement that living standards will get worse before they improve was the most candid political admission of how tough it will be to dismantle seven decades of bureaucratic central planning.

"Today, in acute crisis conditions, it will be impossible to implement reforms painlessly," Yeltsin told the Russian Congress of People's Deputies, the republic's parliament.

"I call on all Russian citizens to understand that a transition to market prices, a difficult transition, a forced transition, is a necessary measure," Yeltsin said. "It will be worse for everybody for about six months."

After that, he predicted, "the stabilization of our economy will begin by autumn 1992, and the living standards of the people will gradually improve."

Yeltsin urged that lawmakers give him new executive powers to help him carry out the reforms and proposed he be given the additional title of prime minister. The post has been vacant since Ivan Silayev resigned to run the national economy following the failed August coup.

The offer was a tacit acknowledgement that Yeltsin has been unable to end the infighting within his administration that has prevented it from carrying out real reform.

It also represented a throwback to previous heads of the Soviet Union who endowed themselves with more than one leadership post.

Yeltsin's reform plan, which must be adopted by the Russian parliament, includes lifting artificial government controls on prices and wages by the end of the year and privatizing half of Russia's 10,000 small- and medium-size businesses within three months.

Expansion won't raise fees if question passes

Money from bond issues would be used to fund projects

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Expansion and remodeling of the Chester E. Peters Recreational Complex will not raise student fees if the student referendum passes.

Raydon Robel, director of recreational services, said the $7.9 million project will be financed with funds collected from redirected bond issues, pending passage of the Rec Complex referendum.

ELECTIONS

That, Robel said, is what makes the proposal a good opportunity for students.

"One of the biggest things in this whole referendum is the fact that this can all be done without an increase in costs to the student," Robel said. "I hope they (students) understand that what the project entails is that there are bonds that are coming to an end and this is just continuing to collect this money and redirecting it toward a project."

The referendum will take place during the Student Government elections Nov. 5-6 and will decide whether or not student fees will be used to fund remodeling and additions to the Rec Complex and Farrell Library. The issues will appear as separate questions on the ballot.

Linking the issues together was considered by both the Rec Complex and Farrell and discussed by Student Senate, Robel said.

Some senators expressed concern that this was not giving the students enough of a choice and an amendment was passed separating the questions.

"We don't see ourselves as being pitted against each other," Robel said of the two referendums. "The library and ourselves are working very hard to take a positive approach that both these expansions are needed."

The Rec Complex has not been expanded or remodeled since its completion in 1980, with the exception of removing a wall in the current weight room to add space.

Robel said he was optimistic that work could begin quickly if the referendum passes.

"With the passage of the referendum and things moving along, a year from now we could be starting construction and opening the expanded area in late '93 or '94," Robel said.

In order for either of the issues to pass, 60 percent of those voting must vote favorably.

A similar referendum for the Rec Complex took place last year during elections but failed to pass.

Robel attributed the failure to a single cause.

"The unfortunate situation of the referendum falling on the same time as the (reorganization) announcements last year," Robel said. "Students felt like that may have hurt the cause, so we worked with Student Senate to bring the issue back this year."

Rec Services Council is a group that has been working with Farrell and others to muster support for the referendum. Kerry DeLay, chairwoman of the council, said their basic goal is to publicize the issue.

"We're trying to educate and inform — clear up some misconceptions," DeLay said.

Clinic possibility examined

Low-cost care plans discussed by health board, task force appointed

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

Through the cooperation of local health care professionals and a matching-funds grant from the state, Riley County hopes to build a primary health care clinic to serve low-income and indigent families.

At this point, the clinic is still in the planning stage, RCHD Director Chuck Murphy said.

The issue came before a partial meeting of the public health board earlier this year and was voted down. "I'm bringing this back up because we only had one meeting with half the board," Murphy said.

The board met at noon Friday to hear the proposal again, but no decision was made regarding the future of the health care clinic.

"They appointed a task force to come back with more details than we had at that time," Murphy said.

The task force must return with additional information, including signatures and statements from volunteers and other information such as when the clinic would open, whom it would serve and a list of services it would offer.

RCHD estimates about 12,000 Riley County residents have problems securing adequate health care.

These people are indigent, Murphy said.

The Medically Indigent and Homeless Commission defines indigent as "being unable to secure health care because of inability to pay for all or a part of such care due to inadequate personal resources."

The closest thing Manhattan has to low-cost primary health care is Lafene Student Health Center.

"Most of the services Lafene offers are primary health care. A few, like physical therapy and the women's clinic, are specialized and considered secondary care," Lafene Director Lannie Zweimiller said.

There are no guidelines for which programs qualify as primary health care. However, health care is divided into three specific parts — primary, secondary and tertiary.

"The best way to define these health care types is through examples," Murphy said. "Lafene is an example of primary care. The Saint Mary Hospital is secondary, and Stormont-Vail is an example of tertiary care."

Gunshot felt like a 'kick'

Sophomore remembers man shooting into crowd

TRISTAN MOHN
Staff Writer

Previn Araujo, sophomore in business administration, is recovering from surgery for a gunshot wound received early Sunday morning in Aggieville.

The surgery was to remove the bullet which was lodged in one of his leg bones.

"I'll be on crutches for a while, but I'll have no problem getting back to 100 percent," he said.

Araujo said he was shot in the right calf with a .25 caliber gun during a scuffle involving a friend that started inside Bushwacker's and moved outside.

"It was just a fight that got out of hand," he said. "It all started when some Fort Riley guys beat up a guy and his girlfriend."

A Bushwacker's waitress, who asked not to be identified, said the fight began when a man made crude comments to the Bushwacker's doorman about his girlfriend.

"The guy saying the remarks hit him (the doorman)," she said. "His girlfriend tried to stop the guy and she got hit."

After this fight was settled, Araujo said a couple of military men started Talking can prevent rape

80 percent of all attacks are by acquaintances

ERIN PERRY
Collegian Reporter

Because in most instances men are the ones who commit rape, they are responsible for preventing rape and educating their peers about it as women are.

Misperceptions and lack of communication contribute to a high instance of acquaintance rape, which makes up about 80 percent of all rapes.

The Ms. Magazine Campus Project on Sexual Assault, completed in 1985, found 84 percent of men who described activity they had engaged in that qualified as rape said they definitely did not commit rape.

Similarly, 27 percent of women who were raped did not identify themselves as rape victims.

Myths such as "No" means "yes" or "She owed him sex for an expensive date" lead to the attitude forced sex isn't rape, which is wrong, said Judy Davis, director of K-State's Women's Resource Center.

"It's very presumptuous to assume we know what it is another person wants," she said. "It's important that men and women learn to talk with one another."

Matt Narramore, junior in economics and member of Women and Men Against Rape, said he agreed discussing sex is an important part of acquaintance rape prevention.

"It's important, particularly in relationships with people you date, to base the relationship on communication and respect," he said.

Though straightforward talk about sex can be embarrassing, Narramore said the payoff will be a stronger relationship and greater level of intimacy.

Men denouncing rape is also vital to prevention, both because they most often are the ones who commit rape and they greatly influence one another, Davis said.

Both Davis and Narramore said it's up to men to be sensitive about violence against women and to educate their peers.

"Men's work to change other men's behavior is the appropriate assumption of responsibility," Davis said.

One killed in KC suburb shootout

PRAIRIE VILLAGE (AP) — Police shot and killed a man who fired at them repeatedly from beneath bushes at an apartment complex, the Johnson County Sheriff's Department said Monday.

Marvin K. Booker, 37, was pronounced dead at Shawnee Mission Medical Center shortly after the pre-dawn exchange of gunfire in this Kansas City suburb, according to the sheriff's department.

In a statement, the department said Prairie Village police received a call around 4:15 a.m. Monday from someone at an apartment complex saying there was an armed individual in an apartment.

Police went to the apartment complex but could not make contact with anyone inside. The officers were searching outside the building when one of them spotted a man in a camouflage jacket lying in a wooded area, the sheriff's department said.

The man shot a large-caliber handgun in the officers' direction and fired twice more after they told him to put the gun down, the statement said. One of the officers returned fire, striking the man.

Prairie Village police and the Johnson County Sheriff's Department were investigating the case.

16 abandoned dogs found near Iola

IOLA (AP) — Ten dead dogs and six live ones, all apparently dumped from a car, were found on a road near the Allen County landfill, Sheriff Ron Moore said Monday.

Some of those found Sunday apparently were already dead when they were dumped late Saturday night, while others were killed by passing vehicles, Moore said.

"I can't figure out who would have that many dogs and why they would have dumped them," Moore said. He added that authorities "can't place anybody that raises dogs like that, and there are no reports of any dogs missing."

All of the dogs were small breeds, mostly cocker spaniels and Yorkshire terriers, the sheriff said.

The six dogs found alive will be held at an animal shelter in LaHarpe for a few days in case someone wants to adopt them, he said.

"A real shame," said Karl Churning, who lives near the site where the dogs were dumped in LaHarpe. "They're pretty little dogs when they're cleaned up. I guess someone just got tired of them."

Turk soldiers pull out of Iraq

DIYARBAKIR, Turkey (AP) — Turkey withdrew its soldiers from northern Iraq Monday after an incursion aimed at wiping out separatist Turkish Kurdish guerrilla bases, Anatolia news agency reported.

The semi-official agency said Kurdish fighters reported 12 people killed and serious damage inflicted on several Kurdish villages by Turkish air raids over the past three days.

Anatolia quoted a clandestine broadcast of Iraqi Kurdistan Democratic Party Radio from inside Iraq.

The military and the government deny targeting civilian areas but the Foreign Ministry said a delegation would go to northern Iraq to investigate.

It was the third time in three months that the Turkish military crossed into Iraq hunting for Turkish Kurdish rebels from the Kurdistan Labor Party. The actions followed attacks on Turkish military posts near the southeastern border.

PLAYBOY'S
PHOTOGRAPHER IS HERE AND INTERVIEWING

Playboy's photographer is now interviewing female students attending Kansas State University for a spring Playboy pictorial on Girls of the Big Eight Conference.

This celebrated annual pictorial features a different college conference each year, and has become one of the most popular and talked-about magazine features in the country. Since Playboy's first college pictorial 14 years ago, nearly 12,000 coeds coast-to-coast have tried out. Many have gone on to become Playboy Playmates, actresses and models.

If selected, you will be paid a modeling fee, be interviewed by the media, be featured at autograph sessions and have the time of your life with the celebrity status you will gain from your appearance in Playboy.

To qualify, you must be 18 years of age or older and registered as a full- or part-time student at a Big Eight* University. Interested students may call to attend the interview sessions taking place at the location listed below.

Project 50 creates new sign to improve safety

Railroad crossings try new look; 3 sites will be tested

DENISE UPHOFF
Collegian Reporter

Many rural railroad crossings are accidents just waiting to happen.

In order to cut down on the number of railroad crossing accidents, a new railroad crossing sign has been developed and is being tested in Kansas.

Eugene Russell, professor of civil engineering, is working in conjunction with Conrail to test these new signs.

"There was a need to find something to better identify the crossing and to help the driver better understand his responsibility to look for trains," Russell said.

Russell said Marty Joyce, Conrail locomotive engineer, suggested to Conrail's Labor/Management Program that something needed to be done to improve railroad crossing warning signs.

Program members agreed, and Joyce was appointed chairman of Project 50, a group formed to investigate the causes of railroad crossing accidents and to look for ways to improve safety.

Project 50 came up with a new warning sign which incorporated the old sign with an additional part.

The top of the sign has the same X shape with the words "railroad crossing" written on it. Located below the X are three aluminum plates, which are bolted at 45-degree angles to form a triangular shape, Russell said.

He said the plates are covered on both sides with red and silver reflecting material and stripes of a mirrored material. Russell said the word "yield" was placed on the front panel to remind drivers of their responsibility at railroad crossings.

According to the United Transportation Union News, the new sign is one of the most significant efforts made in protection in the last 107 years.

Russell said this is the first test done on the signs outside of the railroad yards.

Before the signs could be placed on actual roads for testing, Conrail had to get special permission from the Federal Highway Administration, he said.

Three signs were placed on state highways that crossed either the Santa Fe, Union Pacific or Northern railroads.

The signs, Russell said, were placed at unmarked crossings in Kackley, 20 miles northwest of Concordia on State Highway 148; Cherokee, 15 miles southwest of Pittsburg on State Highway 7; and two miles northeast of Linn on State Highway 15.

"We were rather limited in our site selection," he said. "We wanted sites that were on state highways and did not have active warning devices. The sites were hard to find because there are relatively few left in Kansas."

Russell said the testing of the signs involves several things. He said as the car approaches the railroad tracks, its speed is clocked. The car's deceleration rate is checked, and whether or not the driver applies the brakes.

During the day test, Russell said they also look to see if the driver will look both ways before crossing the tracks.

The tests are done in three-hour time blocks — once during the day and once late at night.

Russell said the testing will begin a few months after the signs have been in place long enough for the novelty effect to wear off.

CHRISTOPHER ASSAF/Staff
Eugene Russell, professor in civil engineering, designed a new railroad-crossing sign that has been field-tested since August at three sites in Kansas. The sign is designed to be more visible than current signs.

Radio, TV students still waiting

Lack of funds delay chance for hands-on experience at station; equipment needed

VICTORIA CHERRIE
Collegian Reporter

K-State's radio and television students could have a future of hands-on experience but funding problems are causing a delay.

K21BZ is a low power TV station that operates through a wireless cable signal transmission by fiber optics. The station operates under 1,000 watts and is used as a one channel campus wireless cable system.

The station allows for flexible broadcasting in low-power television and responds to specific needs on campus, but doesn't allow for on-the-air broadcasting or programming.

The A.Q. Miller School of Journalism and Mass Communications applied for a license for low-power television with the Federal Communications Commission about two years ago. The request was approved and a construction permit for a station was granted, but due to lack of funds the building deadline could not be met, and no station was built.

The Education Communications Center paid for the equipment K21BZ uses and with a new building it now offers studio space that could possibly be used for on-the-air broadcasting in the future.

But the problem of funding still exists. Studio B in the ECC building is available, but it's empty because money is needed for production equipment.

Faculty members in the journalism school have made it a priority to seek funding for equipment.

"The school of journalism has been seeking funding for production equipment for Studio B for over a year," said David MacFarland, associate professor of journalism and mass communications.

"We believe our students need a practical outlet to gain experience," he said.

McCluskey, director of the ECC Building said a problem students have is not getting enough hands-on experience and there doesn't seem to be a middle man. Chastain said many internship opportunities exist within the ECC building. However, a station would also provide great training.

Jim McCluskey, assistant professor of journalism and mass communications, said a station would allow students to obtain more knowledge in their major as well as gaining experience that will train them for future jobs.

She said there are several misconceptions about where the money is coming from and whether or not student fees would be increased.

"One I hear a lot is 'if the library passes and the RecComplex fails that the library gets all of the money that would have gone to both projects' — which is very false — the amounts of money are already set," DeLay said.

She said the council will be operating an information table inside the Union Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of this week and outside of the Union Nov. 4, 5 and 6.

One concern of both Robel and DeLay is that the money will go unused if it is not earmarked for these projects.

"If it's not directed to these two projects it's really up in the air as to where the money will go, because in reality, it will still be collected," DeLay said. "No one will really know where it is going. It needs to be directed to a project."

The project as proposed would include remodeling parts of the existing building to help with the overcrowding and traffic-flow problems the RecComplex is currently experiencing. A larger weight and fitness area would be constructed along with an additional four-court gymnasium area with a longer, elevated running track.

Air conditioning would be installed and the outside tennis courts would be resurfaced and receive lighting upgrades. Lighting and irrigation improvements are also planned for the outdoor playing fields.

Care enough to vote for the very best

Only seven shopping days left.

Seven days, that is, to shop around for the best candidate for student body president. And this year is no year to be uninformed and apathetic.

"Elections, already?" you ask. "What does a student body president really do anyway?"

Well, looking back on recent events should answer those questions for you. If you are a member of a group that was denied allocations or if you were partial to the Brady Bunch-era furniture replaced in the SGA offices, voting in this election is important.

Throughout the rest of this week, the candidates will be visiting various living units and discussing their views on current problems as well as their ideas for the future.

Watch for announcements of candidate forums and go check out these six fine candidates. Then go to the Union Nov. 5 and 6 and vote for the one that strikes your fancy.

Get in the student body president election season spirit.

Drugs Out with the war; in with more education

The stakes have just been raised in President Bush's "War on Drugs."

The House approved an anti-crime bill Oct. 22 that would extend the death penalty to 50 drug-related crimes, including murders committed in the course of most drug-related crimes and attempted murders of witnesses in drug cases.

The bill is now before Bush, who has indicated he would sign gun-control legislation if Congress expanded the list of crimes covered by the federal death penalty and if it imposed strict limits on the ability of state prisoners to appeal their convictions in federal court.

But sentencing the high-up drug dealers and controllers to death is not going to win Bush's "War on Drugs."

Like the mafia, the No. 2 man in the drug business is always ready to step in when the No. 1 man is pulled down. It is such a profitable business, stopping the man at the top will do no good, because there are plenty of people lower on the totem pole who would love to take over.

After all, the drug business wouldn't be where it is today if the dealers didn't have cheap labor all across the country to help them distribute their drugs.

Cheap labor in the form of our children, our little brothers and sisters, who tried the "free" drugs offered to them by a stranger, not knowing they might ultimately carry the price tag of death. And now those children — our children — skip school and peddle drugs to their friends to support the habit they can't even understand.

You haven't impressed us, President Bush, with your war.

Making stiffer penalties for more drug crimes does not stop the violence, the addiction or the drugs. The "War on Drugs" needs to be changed to the "Education on Drugs," and it needs to start with those whose lives are ruined before they ever get started — the children.

President Steffany

Columnist wants to be in charge, and a list of priorities will be her top priority

STEFFANY CARREL

I want to be president. Not governor, not senator, not House representative. President.

You see, I've thought it all over. When next year's presidential election rolls around, who are you going to vote for?

(This assumes of course that you are going to vote. Surely all of you intelligent, well-informed, politically conscious individuals out there will get off your collectively lazy asses come Election Day. Maybe vote and actually make democracy work? Crazy idea, eh?)

Ah-hem. OK, OK. So who are you going to vote for?

Whelp, in the Republican Party corner, weighing in at precisely 63 pounds is the wimp we love to hate, the chump we'd like on a plate and an all-around constipated flake — George Bush!

Ding, ding, ding.

And in the Democratic Party corner, weighing in at exactly ...

Oh, excuse me, ladies and gentlemen. We regret to inform you that there just aren't any worthwhile candidates this time around.

Ding, ding, ding.

So, here I am — the next president of the United States.

Still not convinced I'm the best choice?

Well, then, let me tell you what I'll do when I'm in office.

After I am inaugurated, I will declare a "Time of Listening." Now, I realize that listening in general is a new concept for the presidency. However, you will see me do many a bold thing while I sit in the White House.

My "Time of Listening" will last about three months, and during these three months, I will be in the Oval Office.

What will I be doing? Not counting jellybeans and not playing indoor miniature golf.

I'm going to sit in the Oval Office for three months and listen. Outside of potty breaks and showers, I will be listening to every issue, every problem, every concern.

While listening, I will compile the "Great List of Priorities." (It will go down in history.)

And at the end of it all, the national agenda will be complete — not one matter overlooked.

And then I'll dole out the money — that budget idea. But this time, there won't be any "overexpenditures," no trillion-dollar nightmares.

This because I seem to have learned a very important lesson that previous presidents and Congresses haven't been able to grasp — you don't spend more than you have. Period.

With that said, I'll tell you a few more things.

I'm funny about certain issues. For instance, defense will not, repeat not, top my priority list. I know it's important, if for no other reason than to provide several million jobs, but honestly, we've just about got enough killing machinery. Don't you agree? Then again, maybe the capacity to blow the world up several hundred times over isn't sufficient. I, however, think enough is enough.

Problems on the homefront will reign supreme in my book. Does that make me a Democrat? I sure as hell hope not. I like to think of myself as more of a Demoliblican.

But to perhaps explain why domestic matters concern me so, I think of that saying "If you don't love yourself, you can't love anyone else."

And, by golly, I can't help but see a parallel. We have some serious problems here at home. It's like we caught a cold, and we didn't really acknowledge it. Now it's turned into the flu, and it'll be threatening pneumonia pretty quick here if we don't wise up.

We need to get better. We need to concentrate on improving this country, and then we can try to save the rest of the world. I'm not talking isolationism. I'm talking common sense.

Well, outside of solving all the problems of the United States, I want to point out a few final important tidbits.

I'm young. I'm open-minded. I'm not here to look good to the press, write any memoirs, or sell T-shirts and buttons.

And, above all, I'm really willing to fix the country.

So when Election Day strolls up to greet you, remember my name. Because I want to be president.

America's been

Apathy breeds decadence

JASON HAMILTON

Why are the people running our nation are such slimes? Maybe power corrupts. Or maybe it just takes a certain type of sliminess to get elected these days.

Normally, this doesn't bother me. The country seems stable enough for me to live out my nice, quiet, self-centered life.

I've come to grips with the fact that our country is being controlled by people of low morals and almost no commitment to the premises of our Constitution.

It bothers me a lot, however, when I think they are insulting my intelligence. If they are going to outright lie to the nation, at least they can come up with something convincing.

The first time I had to deal with my oozing anger at being lied to by the government was during the Iran-Contra affair, starting in 1986. I remember thinking that no one could actually believe Reagan and Bush weren't involved.

And yet, it seemed, Americans did believe it. No one wanted to disbelieve it.

Later, Bush wanted us to believe Noriega was a serious threat to U.S. National Security and to forget that he was placed there and trained by the CIA, and also to forget that Bush was the director of the CIA during a good portion of those early years.

And now I feel the anger bubbling up again. Oliver North has forsaken loyalty, the only trait I admired in him, for a large sum of money. His book, "Under Fire," supposedly reveals that Ronald Reagan knew everything.

Apparently, everyone knew about it. Most everyone forgot about it, too, as soon as it became a problem. This is hardly admirable, but also hardly surprising.

North claims, in an Oct. 8 issue of Time magazine, everything that happened after it all blew up in his face was an elaborate, yet successful, attempt to save the president.

"No one wanted another Watergate" is a statement tossed around quite a bit.

Well, there was no re-enactment of Watergate, that's for sure. Everyone, even the special prosecutor, was ready to get the issue taken care of and buried before it spread as high as the president.

It was all a scheme, a way to get around what the American people thought the government should and should not be doing. No wonder the conservative power block was so sure there was as plot behind Anita Hill coming forward when she did. To them, everything is a plot. It's how they operate. According to North, it's what they enjoy.

Suzie was with me when I saw the cover of Time. She knew I was angry, because I was clenching and unclenching my jaw.

"Cheer up, Jason. It's not like they assassinated Frank Zappa or anything," she said.

I tried to explain to her that what these people were doing was mostly illegal and thoroughly immoral. I pointed out they had ignored the law as if they were inherited nobility, as if they were the law. Suzie seemed much more interested in a bug crawling along the window sill.

Finally, my anger at the slimes in Washington, D.C., combined with my frustration with Suzie, and I almost shouted at her, "They've insulted the intelligence of the American public. They've insulted my intelligence!"

"That's OK, Jason," she replied. "You're not all that intelligent, anyway."

Maybe she's right. Maybe it's dumb of me to expect my fellow Americans to rise up in anger against the putrid mass of double-talk coming out of the White House. Suzie sure isn't going to.

In fact, if the Iran-Contra affair will teach us anything, it may be that Bush and his palace guard can get away with anything. Anything short of breaking onto prime-time television and interfering with "America's Funniest Home Videos," that is. Then we would see some grass-roots action.

This one covert operation is more illegal than Watergate ever could be, and no one seems to care.

It never stops. We just keep finding out more and more about how Bush and Reagan can't be trusted.

It never seems to make any difference, either. Bush will probably be re-elected and will spend another four years shoveling pig swill down the throats of his constituents. Who's going to care enough to vote him out of office?

Cheerleader selection procedures reviewed

Lack of documentation in process cited

PAUL NOEL
Assistant Campus Editor

The procedures for selecting K-State cheerleaders will be reviewed and better documented.

A group of six University officials met Monday morning to discuss the selection procedures for cheerleaders. Chuck Reagan, assistant to the president, called the meeting to order at 10 a.m. in Anderson 122. He then moved to go into executive session until 10:45 a.m. to discuss attorney-client and personnel issues.

Reagan said the action decided in executive session was to have Chris Peterson, associate director of intercollegiate athletics, be the committee's representative, to overlook the criteria for choosing cheerleaders and to have Peterson respond with each side of the issue.

Peterson said the cheerleader adviser, Scott Johnson, has done a great job in making the K-State cheerleaders become nationally ranked, but due to the recent questioning of the selection process, the procedures and policies are being reviewed.

"Scott Johnson has my total support and does a great job," Peterson said. Early this fall, Audra Henderson, freshman in elementary education, was denied a position on the cheerleading squad because she did not have the collegiate look. However, in a letter to the Collegian, Johnson said Henderson was not chosen because several other women outperformed her.

Peterson said the committee will check with other institutions on their selection processes.

"We will review numerous other processes as we review our own to make sure we come up with the most fair and accurate procedures in cheerleading selection," he said.

Henderson said her main concern with the selection process was the lack of documentation.

Peterson said there will be more documentation which will be accessible by all people involved.

"There was no documentation of the selection process, which was something he (Johnson) was not required to have in the past," Peterson said. "That will never happen again."

Henderson said she is glad actions are being taken to change the selection process.

"I think something needed to be done," Henderson said.

K-State has arrived in Salina

Dedication makes KCT merger official; renovations to continue until 1994

HEATHER RESZ
Collegian Reporter

The formal gate and entrance to K-State-Salina was dedicated Monday. "The purpose of the formal dedication was twofold," said Scott Sewell, Coordinator of Development and College Relations. "First, we wanted to thank the residents of Salina for everything they've done to help us get this far. And second, to officially say 'K-State is here.'"

K-State-Salina was only possible through the cooperation of the Salina Airport Authority, the City of Salina, the state of Kansas, the Board of Regents, K-State and the Salina Area Chamber of Commerce, Sewell said.

A representative from each organization spoke at the dedication.

All six speakers shared a central theme, "It's not what Salina's going to gain, it's what the State of Kansas gains."

"There is no capital to gain here. The benefit is to the state of Kansas as a whole," said Tim Rogers, executive director of the Salina Airport Authority.

"What was driven home through all of this was the need for engineering technology in this state. Without this need, the support to merge these colleges would never have been gained."

"There was a lot of support for this project. About 6,000 to 7,000 people voted 'yes,'" said Gerald Cook, president of the Salina Chamber of Commerce.

Over the next four years, an expected $4.5 million worth of capital improvements will be done to the campus and the structures there. "In order to raise the funds needed to improve the campus, the city of Salina passed a half-cent sales tax for a two-year period," Interim Dean Jerry Cole said.

"So many improvements will be made here and to have a formal event for every one of them is a little much, so we are using the entrance as a backdrop for the campus and all the enhancements that will happen here," Sewell said.

The entrance to campus is only partly finished, and other renovations on campus have not yet begun. Renovations will be going on continuously from now until 1994, Dean Barnum, director of facilities said.

"To merge K-State-KCT would be an example of an idea whose time has come," President Jon Wefald said.

Rape

Men have a tremendous influence on their peers' perception of masculinity, she said, and they learn how to "act like men" from each other's behavior.

Narramore said, "They judge themselves as men largely on what other men think."

Davis said men should use that influence to confront misogynist remarks they hear from other men. Instead of getting defensive, they can let people who make such comments know they find them unacceptable, she said.

Davis said she acknowledged that it's difficult for men to speak out about sexism, but she said men are more likely to listen to other men about it.

Women who criticize sexism are often brushed off, called prudes or "bad sports," Davis said.

It's not that they won't listen to women speak about violence against women. But she said it has a more profound effect coming from another male, and it sends the message that it's not non-masculine to disagree with those attitudes.

Davis said she has seen a rise in interest in acquaintance-rape prevention in the Greek community. She has spoken with some fraternity pledge classes this semester and said she hopes others will follow suit.

While she welcomes the interest, she said, she still wonders how welcome her program would have been if

Preventing acquaintance rape

Tips for men

- Communicate. This means talking and listening.
- Never force a woman to have sex or any other sexual contact.
- Stay sober. If you get drunk or stoned, don't have sex.
- Don't take advantage of a drunk or stoned woman. If she does not have the ability to consent to sex, it's rape.
- Do not "join in" if a friend invites you to participate in sexual behavior. This is gang rape.
- Don't assume you know what a woman wants. Communication is important here.
- "No" means "no". Do not argue or cajole or ignore her. Words can be as forceful as actions.

Tips for women

- Set sexual limits and communicate them to your date.
- Be assertive.
- Stay sober.
- Find out about a new date from friends. Double date or go to public places until you are comfortable enough to be alone with him.
- Remain in control — pay for yourself or part of the date; consider meeting him so you have your own transportation.
- Be cautious — take self-defense classes and try not to get into difficult situations.
- Trust your feelings. If you feel uncomfortable for any reason, leave.

the pledge trainers — their peers — had not arranged it.

But Davis said the tide is turning in the perception of rape — it's no longer a stranger in the dark, and, slowly, women are no longer being accused of "asking for it."

"This generation of men is more likely to be punished for things their fathers and grandfathers did with impunity," she said.

Men Against Rape was founded two years ago by Jack Straton, a physics research assistant who was the co-chairman of the National Organization for Men Against Sexism.

The group later included "Women" in its name when women expressed interest in joining because it was the only anti-rape group on campus.

The group's focus, Narramore said, is to end rape.

"And, to do that we have to address all of the sexist, patriarchal attitudes that support it by way of education and activities."

harassing a friend of his, whom he declined to identify.

He was not sure if these were the same men who were involved in the first fight. The management kicked all of them out of the establishment before any fist-throwing occurred.

Once outside, Araujo said everybody calmed down for a while. But when the fight started up again he was shot by one of the military men when his friend and the crowd fled the scene.

"I was just in the crowd," he said. "I don't think he knew where he was shooting. I think he just shot into the crowd."

Araujo said everyone was running away from the incident, so the man had no motive to shoot anyone. He said he didn't know how many shots were fired.

"I didn't even hear the one that shot me," Araujo said. "It didn't feel like I got shot, it just felt like I got kicked."

Two Fort Riley soldiers were arrested in connection with the incident.

Michael C. Arceneaux was arrested for aggravated battery and carrying a concealed weapon. He remains in the Riley County Jail on a bond of $10,000.

Lawrence E. Ballard was arrested for carrying a concealed weapon. He was released Sunday on a $1,000 bond.

Major Bill McCormick, public affairs officer at Fort Riley, said Ballard is not in custody on the post. The military police picked him up after he posted bond and released him to his commanding officer.

"The civilian authorities will prosecute the case because the offense was committed off-post," he said.

The case would not be tried in both systems, he said. But the results of the trial will carry over to the men's military future.

"The outcome of the charges will have great impact their military careers," he said. "Depending on the severity of the charges, it could end a career."

McCormick said the case is in the hands of the Riley County Police Department which are still conducting an investigation.

Russia also plans to cut foreign aid and credits to all countries and will charge world prices for its natural resources to those republics outside the new common market, he said.

Tax laws will be rewritten to stimulate businesses, particularly those producing scarce consumer goods, and new rules will be drawn up to facilitate land reform, the selling of

Hawks picked to win Big 8 crown

Forecasters
pick Lady Cats in tie for 8thBILL LANG
Contributing Writer

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — Watch out Big Eight women's teams. Joann Rutherford is a bit mad about last season and where she was picked to finish this season.

She plans to do something about it. Last season, the Missouri Tigers had their first losing season under the guidance of Rutherford, finishing 10-18 overall and 3-11 in the conference.

At the first Big Eight Basketball Media Day for women this year, the Tigers were picked sixth behind preseason favorite KU, Colorado, Oklahoma State, Nebraska and Oklahoma.

"We've got a lot of people coming back, people at every position who can make a difference in the game," Rutherford said. "The main thing we have right now is shooters. That doesn't mean we're making the basket. It means we just have some shooters."

Rutherford, the 19th winningest coach in NCAA Division I history with 325 wins, returns several players who received substantial playing time.

"We had five freshmen get a lot of playing time due to the injuries we suffered last season," Rutherford said. "The best thing about that is that they're all sophomores now."

But if Missouri is to get the Big Eight title, it must travel through Lawrence.

KU coach Marian Washington, the dean of the Big Eight women's coaches with 18 seasons of service and 322 wins to her credit, also has the luxury of having all her players returning.

Washington was surprised by Rutherford's reaction to Missouri's preseason ranking.

"She can have the top spot if she wants it," Washington said. "At least it will take some pressure off our kids."

K-State women's basketball coach Susan Yow will have to replace a large portion of her team's scoring with the departures of Diana Miller, Nadira Hazim and Kristie Bahner. The Lady Cats were picked to finish in a tie for eighth with Iowa State in the preseason Big Eight poll.

KU is coming off a 20-13 overall and a disappointing 7-7 conference record with a second-place finish at the Big Eight Women's Tournament in Salina last March.

What will help the Jayhawks this year is rebounding. Last year, KU finished as the top rebounding team in the conference with 600 (42.9 average), and all the leading rebounders are back for their season opener Nov. 14. The lone exception is Lisa Tate, who will miss four to five weeks with a stress fracture in her lower leg.

"This league has turned into an inside game with players," Washington said. "You look at the preseason conference first-team picks and they're all forwards or centers and that shows you what kind of game it is."

Bringing up the rear in the conference are Iowa State and K-State. The Cyclones and Lady Cats received 15 votes in the preseason coaches poll. Coaches at the top said teams at the bottom will have something to say about who wins the league crown.

"We all know how teams react when they are at home," Oklahoma State coach Dick Halterman, whose Cowgirls were picked third with 39 points, said. "We've got a lot of talented people coming back, but that won't mean anything if we take the lower division lightly."

One driving incentive for every team to do well this year is that Boulder, Colo., will be the site of the NCAA

Chiefs rally to beat Raiders

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — At least the week was not a total flop for the tomahawk chop. Steve DeBerg hit Tim Barnett with a 6-yard touchdown pass with 47 seconds to go Monday night capping a 57-yard drive that vaulted the Kansas City Chiefs over the Los Angeles Raiders 24-21.

One night after the Minnesota Twins beat the Atlanta Braves in the seventh game of the World Series, the 77,000 tomahawk-chopping Chiefs fans saw their team slice through the Raiders defense for two late touchdowns.

DeBerg faced fourth-and-four from the 11 and rifled a pass to Todd McNair, who leaned away from a tackler for a first down at the six with 51 seconds left. He then found Barnett cutting across the end zone for the winning score.

The Raiders (5-4), losing for only seventh time in 37 Monday night games, led 21-10 and had the ball inside the 10 when Lloyd Burruss intercepted Jay Schroeder's pass and returned it 83 yards to the 15. On fourth-and-inches, Christian Okoye slanted around the left end for the touchdown, making it 21-17.

After forcing a punt, the Chiefs got 18 yards on DeBerg's pass to Pete Holohan that almost was intercepted by Ronnie Lott, whose fourth-quarter interceptions were pivotal in the Raiders' previous two victories.

After rookie Harvey Williams ran 11 yards to the 39, Fred Jones caught a 9-yard pass at the goal line, but he was called for offensive interference against Lionel Washington. That dropped the Chiefs back to the 19, but DeBerg hit McNair at the 11, then again for the critical first down.

Then he and Barnett chopped down the Raiders.

Deron Cherry intercepted Schroeder's pass with 33 seconds to go to seal the victory and keep the Chiefs (6-3) a half-game behind Denver in the AFC West.

Scoring five points off the Chiefs' first two possessions and getting several long completions from Schroeder, the Raiders took control early. Greg Townsend, the Raiders' 265-pound defensive end, batted down DeBerg's swing pass on the Chiefs' first possession, gathered the ball in and rumbled for what was signaled a 32-yard touchdown return. But review officials overturned the call and said Williams, the intended receiver, rode down Townsend at the 1-yard line.

Two rushes lost about a foot, and the Raiders settled for Jeff Jaeger's 18-yarder. On the Chiefs' third play of their next possession, Aaron Wallace sacked DeBerg and knocked the ball loose. Townsend again missed a touchdown by inches when the ball skittered away from him in the end zone. The Chiefs' Barnett fell on it for a safety.

On third-and-15 a few minutes later, Schroeder hit Mervyn Fernandez — who had no defender within 10 yards of him — on the 48. Fernandez, who had over 100 receiving yards for the 12th time in his career, fled diagonally across the field for the corner of the end zone but was stopped at the one by Jayce Pearson for a 59-yard gain.

On the next play, Nick Bell was sandwiched between tacklers and suffered broken ribs as he scored the touchdown. Bill Maas blocked the extra point.

Schroeder hit a wide-open Steve Smith with a 37-yard touchdown pass in the second quarter to give the Raiders an 18-7 halftime lead.

The Chiefs, who beat the Raiders in both their meetings last year despite the Raiders winning the AFC West, finally got rolling in the second quarter with an eight-play, 45-yard

Honeycutt back with Lady Cats

K-State women's basketball coach Susan Yow announced that Leah Honeycutt returned to the Lady Cats on Monday after a dispute last year forced her removal from the team.

"Over the last 18 months there are a lot of things that have happened," Yow said. "A lot of good things have taken place with our first recruiting class and new assistant coaches. The reinstatement of Leah is one of the most positive things that has happened since we've been here."

"It is my desire to be a part of this program once again," Honeycutt said. "I have really missed it. I've missed the association. I've always loved the game and I want to be a part of what is happening now in the Kansas State women's basketball program."

"I have realized some things that I did not realize before. My attitude has changed and I think it has changed for the better. I think I'll be a better person for it. This is a good thing for me and the people who are involved and I look forward to moving ahead."

Honeycutt averaged 3.8 points per game in two seasons with the Lady Cats. The Houston, Texas, forward scored in double figures five times last season and pulled down 10 or more rebounds in three games. She posted double-doubles against Nebraska (14 points and 14 rebounds) and Southern Methodist (12 points and 14 rebounds).

"I'm thrilled to have her back on the team," Yow said. "We're moving forward as a basketball team and Leah being a part of this program is going to help our basketball team."

Women's rugby team unbeaten

The K-State women's rugby team continued its winning streak when it played Mankato State Saturday at Ames, Iowa.

After winning the Heart of America Tournament last weekend, the team built a 20-point halftime lead and cruised to a 34-0 win.

K-State scored six tries and a penalty try. Paula Wunder, Terri Kinder, Cyndi Cushing, Christy Allen and Perita Fhumate each scored one try. Tracy Bartz added two conversion kicks to complete K-State's scoring.

"We didn't play as well as we usually play," club president LaDonna Grenz said. "But Mankato wasn't as good as the teams we previously played."

"We gave our newcomers more playing time to get more experience. In this game, they had more chances to carry the ball and to score than in the other games."

Walden blasts Big 10 rule

Cyclone coach also says tie not bad for team

By the Associated Press

KANSAS CITY, Mo. — They may call Jim Walden a lot of things, but they'll never call him non-committal. What does the Iowa State coach think of the Big Ten's firing Indiana

"I don't know that tying is kissing your sister. I've had some dismal ties. But everybody doesn't lose in a tie, only the press people do."

Jim Walden

coach Bill Mallory $10,000 for criticizing officials?

"It hinges on idiocy," Walden said Monday at the Big Eight coaches' teleconference. "It's unbelievable that in this country, in this world, we have got it tied down so much that ... officials ... are never wrong, and if they are, you don't ever criticize them. No one has that protection."

"I could say President Bush's decision was atrocious, and not one soul would say a word to me," Walden said. "Whoever in the Big Ten is responsible for this, they ought to get him in an institution."

Mallory was given the choice of paying the fine or being suspended for a game. He chose the suspension.

After playing Oklahoma State to a 6-6 tie Saturday, Walden was similarly opinionated as to whether he wants college football to put in a tiebreaker.

"No," he said. "Saturday, I was ready to quit. I don't know that tying is kissing your sister. I've had some dismal ties. But everybody doesn't lose in a tie, only the press people do. You tie, only the press people do. You people can't let us have two winners. How come two people can't come away feeling good, not just one?"

No player in the Big Eight has burst into stardom with quite the energy this year as Nebraska quarterback Keithen McCant. In a little more than half a game Saturday, he rushed for 124 yards and a touchdown on nine carries and hit 9-of-13 passed for 144 yards and three touchdowns in a 63-6 rout of Missouri.

"Keithen has been consistent all year," said Nebraska coach Tom Osborne. "He is throwing about 60 percent completions. The thing that sneaks up on people is that he's done well running the ball. I think he has about 400 total yards rushing now. He's a multidimensional player, a good runner and a good thrower. He's a big, strong guy, about 6-3, 200 pounds."

"It's hard to get a good pass rush on him. He's got the mobility to get out of trouble."

This week it will be Colorado's turn to try to stop McCant.

"He's strong for a quarterback," said Buff coach Bill McCartney. "He's a big kid. He's deceptively strong. He Missouri lost more than the game. Running back Ronnell Kayhill was lost for the year with an injury, said Coach Bob Stull. The Tigers also spent much of the game without defensive end Stacy Elliott.

"We had our share of injuries. Early in the game we lost a couple of guys," said Stull, who likened the game to the 55-7 pasting his team absorbed against Colorado. "There's all kinds of reasons, not many excuses."

Baseball's business season in full swing

Bonilla, Tartabull top sluggers seeking free-agent contracts

By the Associated Press

MINNEAPOLIS — Less than 17 hours after the final out of the World Series, baseball's business season got underway as Jack Morris made himself eligible for free agency, and Pittsburgh outfielder Bobby Bonilla was among the first 21 players to file.

Morris, who pitched one of the great games in Series history Sunday night, and was picked as the MVP, declined to exercise a 1992 contract option for $3.65 million with the hope that he can agree to a new deal with the Twins at a higher salary. He and the other potential free agents have until Nov. 11 to file.

Among the prominent players who did file on the first possible day were Kansas City outfielder Danny Tartabull, California first baseman Wally Joyner, Los Angeles second baseman Juan Samuel, New York Mets pitcher Frank Viola, Los Angeles pitcher Mike Morgan and Chicago Cubs pitcher Rick Sutcliffe.

In other moves, the Toronto Blue Jays declined to exercise 1992 options on outfielders Mookie Wilson and Dave Parker, making them eligible to file. The Cincinnati Reds declined to exercise the 1992 option on outfielder Carmelo Martinez and declined to offer salary arbitration to pitcher Ted Power, making those two eligible.

In order to exercise his option, Morris would have had to notify the Twins by Monday. Both the Major League Baseball Players Association and the owners' Player Relations Committee said they did not receive any notification.

Morris earned $3.65 million this season, including a $50,000 bonus for making the American League all-star team and $100,000 for being selected as World Series MVP. He had the rare player option for next year and an option for 1993 at a salary ranging from $2 million to $3.85 million depending on his starts and innings pitched next season.

"At the conclusion of the 1991 season, the player must notify the club in writing on the first day of free agency election period of his desire to continue the contract for the following year," the deal states.

"I think we did this deal with the idea of revisiting it after the first year," Twins general manager Andy MacPhail said. "We probably would have looked at it again had we finished first or third or whatever."

Richard Moss, Morris' agent, declined comment Monday on Morris' intentions.

Bonilla, who hit .302 with 18 homers and 100 RBIs, is the best hitter available. He turned down a $16.8 million, four-year offer from the Pirates and is expected to get a deal worth at least $25 million over five years.

"I'm having an open mind about anything," he said. "I want to go to the right situation for me and my family."

KU director put on leave for alleged slurs

Administrator called woman 'fat Indian chick,' says paper

By the Associated Press

LAWRENCE — A week after his name surfaced in a court hearing about a cocaine deal, the University of Kansas affirmative action director was placed on paid leave Monday over slurs attributed to him.

James Turner has denied selling cocaine or making the statements attributed to him Monday by the University Daily Kansan, the student newspaper.

The newspaper reported that Turner, during a interview last week, referred to a woman as a "fat Indian chick" and to a male law professor as "just a faggot anyway."

Del Shankel, executive vice chancellor, placed Turner on indefinite administrative leave while the university investigates the matter.

"We deplore the type of language attributed to Mr. Turner, and we are investigating the circumstances," he said.

Shankel said he could not comment on a 20-minute meeting he had with Turner on Monday morning before announcing the action.

Turner did not immediately return telephone calls from the Associated Press to his home and office Monday.

However, the Lawrence Daily Journal-World quoted him as saying the article in the Daily Kansan "was a complete fabrication, and I'm not speaking to reporters until I get to the bottom of it."

Turner has directed the university's affirmative action office since 1987. Thomas Berger, associate director of the office, will serve as acting director during Turner's leave, Shankel said.

Turner's name was mentioned Oct. 21 during a preliminary court hearing for Kenneth Lee Morris, who is charged with first-degree murder in a fatal attack on a Lawrence man.

The victim, 40-year-old Danny Davis, died several days after he was beaten with a golf club.

Two Lawrence police officers testified Morris told them in an interview that Turner sold him cocaine in a house where the beating later occurred.

Turner was quoted by the Journal-World as saying he did not know why Morris would tell police he had sold him drugs. He also said he did not know why his name was on a list of about 160 witnesses who could be called in Morris' trial.

Turner said Davis had mowed his lawn, and he sometimes gave Davis and his girlfriend a ride to the house where Davis was staying. He said that contrary to the police testimony, he never had been in the house.

No criminal charges have been filed against Turner in the case.

The Daily Kansan said two of its reporters interviewed Turner last week about the Davis murder.

The newspaper quoted him as saying that early in the day that Davis was beaten, he drove Davis and Davis' girlfriend to the house and "two people were waiting for Danny — a man with tattoos and a fat Indian chick."

Later in the interview, according to the newspaper, Turner said, "I later found out she was a Mexican, not an Indian."

The newspaper also said Turner initiated a brief discussion about his knowledge of sexual harassment complaints against the University of Kansas School of Law. The complaints were filed with the university earlier this year by two current and two former female law students.

Turner said one of the women had a valid claim, but the others were only out for money, the Daily Kansan quoted him as saying. The newspaper said Turner remarked a male law professor cited in the allegations was "just a faggot anyway."

Local club unites mountain bikers

Improving reputation, riding with common sense goal of riders; weekend rides planned

MICHAEL MARTIN
Collegian Reporter

The Fat Tire Mountain Bike Club is a new non-profit organization in Manhattan trying to unite local bikers and improve the reputation of mountain bikers.

The club was founded in April and is in the process of trying to become a K-State club. Of the club's 38 members, more than 30 are K-State students.

Club President Dan Ereth said the club offers Sunday rides at Randolph and at Tuttle Creek to bring together local riders and to show new riders in town the available places to ride.

Ereth said improving the reputation of mountain bikers in the city is another important goal the club is focusing on.

"More and more mountain bikers are getting bad reputations by cutting across streets and by not obeying stop lights and stop signs," he said.

"Some people don't ride with common sense; they just tear off the road and think they own the place."

Terry DeWeese, Manhattan Parks and Recreation director, agrees.

DeWeese said the trails below the Sunset Zoo in the Sunset Cemetery were closed last spring because mountain bikers were running people off the trails and causing erosion.

He said the bikers were abusing the privilege, and there was no way to control the activity behind the zoo.

The club has already taken steps to improve the reputation a few riders have given all of them.

Ereth said the club received permission from the Corps of Engineers at Milford Lake to hold a campout ride there last weekend. To show their appreciation, club members spent an hour Sunday morning picking up trash.

"Picking up trash is something no one likes to do, but it establishes good relations with the people and it is good for the environment," he said.

Ereth also said the club wants to help repair existing trails and establish new trails in the area.

"We would like to approach the city about using underdeveloped parks for our recreation sport until the land is developed."

DeWeese said, "We don't have anything in the city park system for mountain bikers besides Linear Park."

Both the Pathfinder and the Aggie Bike Station have given their support to the club, Ereth said, by giving club members a 5-percent discount on certain items.

"I think the club is needed for the amount of riders here to get access to trails," Aggie Bike Station owner Waid

Davis said. "It also helps people meet other people who ride."

Ereth also said the club is looking into improving the locking mechanisms on campus and in town. The ones in use now are not practical with the quick release wheels that most bikes have and there are new locking mechanisms on the market that would lock up the bikes frame and tires, he said.

But Ereth said to accomplish some of these long-term goals, the club will have to raise money. The club is organizing the second annual Dirtfest mountain bike race that will be in April, and the club is also looking into holding a fund-raiser.

The club has planned its first out-of-state weekend trip to Columbia, Mo., for Oct. 26. The club also has a hotline that provides information about upcoming meetings and rides.

Dickens needs total remodeling

Regents say hall needed repairs 3 years ago, rated hall 52 out of 100 possible

DEREK THOMAN
Collegian Reporter

Dickens Hall has had major water damage in the past, and its windows are in poor shape. However, there are no immediate plans for renovating the 84-year-old structure.

Dickens, which houses the geography and statistics departments, has had these problems for many years.

Duane Nellis, head of the Department of Geography, said water is a major problem in the building.

"Unlike other buildings, the roof drains inside to a pipe on the interior, not the exterior of the building," Nellis said. "If the pipe becomes plugged, then water spills into the building."

Charles Martin, professor of geography, said the windows are a problem, especially in the winter.

"In the winter, the wind blows snow right through the cracks around the window frames," Martin said.

Nellis said most of the windows near computers have been fixed, but things were still getting ruined because of the poor shape of the windows and their frames.

"I have had books, papers and satellite imagery damaged by rain leaking through the cracks," he said.

Another downfall Martin cited was Dickens isn't handicapped-accessible. He said someone on crutches or in a wheelchair would have difficulty reaching the geography classrooms on the second floor.

A study was done in fall 1988 by the Board of Regents that gave a condition value to Dickens. The value of Dickens was 52 on a scale of 100. According to board standards, Dickens is in need of "total remodeling."

In 1976, Dickens and Holton Hall were to be remodeled through state funding. A trade-off was made to renovate Nichols Hall instead. Nichols was gutted by a fire in December 1968.

Lee McQueen, director of Architectural and Engineering Services, said there are no immediate plans to do any renovations on the building, but it would benefit from some sort of remodeling.

"That would be a major investment, but right now our No. 1 priority is the library," McQueen said.

Dickens was built in 1907, and named after Professor Albert Dickens, who was head of the horticulture department from 1901-1930. In 1931, steps were taken to remodel some classrooms and labs in the building.

"To get your own team to play in such a big event in a building in your own conference is almost too much,"

Rutherford said. "That would almost automatically make it a home game for anyone who is chosen to play in the regional."

"But first we have the season and the (Big Eight Postseason) Tournament to deal with," Rutherford added. "Then we'll talk about who's going where in the NCAA's."

Professor, 75 others meet Bush, discuss tourism in rural communities

KIP BEASLEY

President Bush took three hours out of his day Monday to meet with Linda Richter, K-State professor of political science, in an economic briefing with 75 other leaders in the travel and tourism industry.

"For the first time, a president has signaled an interest in the travel and tourism industry," Richter said.

This year the travel and tourism industry became the third largest industry in the nation and has had an important effect on the economy. Bush met with experts from both public and private tourism agencies and senior cabinet officials.

"The purpose of the briefing was to recognize the important role of travel and tourism on world economics and to recognize administrative roles that are being taken to promote it," said Jeff Zogt, associate director of the public liaison office at the White House.

Bush mentioned the importance of rural tourism and economic development, Richter said.

"Rural tourism is an important part of Midwest industry," Richter said. "The growth in jobs in rural areas is going to have to be non-farm related."

The president used Dodge City as an example of a rural community that has increased its economic development through international tourism.

Richter said the increase in Kansas

Students in veterinary medicine and architecture and design are enjoying discounts on books and supplies, while their colleges benefit from resulting profits.

A group of students who wanted to reduce the cost of purchasing books and supplies formed the Kansas Veterinary Educational Supply Service in 1972. They pooled their buying power to take advantage of lower prices.

KVESS is operated by vet-med students and is governed by a board of directors and a board of trustees. Both boards consist of students in the College of Veterinary Medicine.

"By buying in volume, we can get discounts on the books," said Store Manager Travis McKinzie, third-year student in veterinary medicine. "Then we mark the books up just enough to cover expenses and any losses we might incur. All the profits go back into SCAVMA."

SCAVMA, the Student Chapter of the American Veterinary Medical Association, uses the money to fund speakers, specialty clubs within the college, Open House expenses, intramural sports and trips to national conventions.

Any money left over goes back into the college in other ways.

"This year, we're buying lockers for students to use in the main conference rooms. Now they will have a place to put their books," McKinzie said.

Students can order books, clothing items, instruments and other equipment necessary for classwork. KVESS also offers surgery packs to juniors for free.

"In the past, juniors have always had to purchase the packs for lab. Now they can borrow them from KVESS," McKinzie said.

"We have everything a student would need to get through vet school and we can special order anything we don't carry."

An assistant manager helps McKinzie run the store.

"Those who work at the store get good business-management experience while they check into discounts and special prices that keep the costs down for other students," McKinzie said.

A similar store was opened in July for the students in the College of Architecture and Design.

"The students have all along wanted a way to earn money and put it back into the college," said Lyle Hornbaker, president of the Architecture and Design Educational Supply Service.

Hornbaker, senior in architecture, said the store is still in the formative stages—only a few items are offered at this time.

"As we start getting orders and establish a capital base, we will expand our store," he said.

The store currently sells tracing paper, lead, lead holders, parallel bars and a few other items.

Any profits earned by the store will be put back into the college, Hornbaker said.

The money will be used for equipment, facility upgrades, scholarships and an Outstanding Educator Award, he said.

The store is a non-profit organization governed by a board of directors, which consists of five students and one faculty member.

Both stores are located off campus.

After the task force returns with more information, and if the board approves the proposal, the next step is to begin preparing a grant application for next year.

"Friday's board meeting showed there is overwhelming support from the community for this kind of project," Murphy said. "This has been ranked as the biggest unmet need by multiple surveys done by organizations like the United Way and Saint Mary."

Even if the board approves the proposal, there is no guarantee funds will be available next year.

"It is only in the event that additional money is allotted that we would be in a position to secure a grant," Murphy said.

Public primary health care facilities are a new solution currently being implemented to improve health care available to those who cannot afford insurance premiums.

"We're not trying to come up with 'the answer.' We're going out to medical professionals and saying, 'This is the problem. How can you help us solve it?'" Murphy said. "And so, from that perspective, this truly is a community clinic."

The grant available for the clinic this year matched $160,000 of soft-match funds with $160,000 hard-match funds.

Hard matches are cash, while soft matches usually take the form of in-kind services, like volunteering time, equipment or buildings.

The newness of this type of program raises several unanswered questions for the public health board.

Questions asked about the program are whether the state will continue to fund the program; how much physician time will be donated; how much will laboratory, X-rays and pharmaceuticals costs; whether students and out-of-county persons can use the services; and how much city and county support will be contributed.

"It's a pilot project," Murphy said. "There are a lot of unknowns."

A number of area professionals who work with low-income families spoke in support of the project at Friday's meeting. Representatives from the Manhattan Emergency Shelter and Headstart and school nurses attended to show support for the program.

tourism can be attributed to people's interest in wagon trails and the frontier.

Recently an article about Kansas tourism appeared on the front page of the New York Times because the state has had the most rapid increase in international tourism of the 50 states.

Leaders present for the briefing were also given the first opportunity to view a promotional video, "America: Yours to Discover," in which Bush makes a personal invitation to viewers. The video is a part of a new initiative to be launched in 1992 targeting visitors from foreign countries.

Richter was appointed academic representative to the national travel and tourism advisory board in August 1990. She was appointed on the basis of her writings on travel and tourism politics. The 15-person board deals with issues concerning international tourism in the United States, Richter said.

"Last Friday I was giving a lecture on Southeast Asia at the University of Texas, and I got a message to call the White House," Richter said. "When I called back, I found out about the briefing. It was exciting."

Richter said Bush gave a good talk, and the meeting was good because it brought together a cross section of the travel industry for the first time.

Chiefs

drive capped by DeBerg's 8-yard toss to Bill Jones.

That made it 11-7. But the Raiders responded with a 77-yard march in eight plays. On third-and-one, Steve Smith got behind linebacker Dino Hackett, caught Schroeder's pass at about the 15 and pranced untouched into the end zone.

Jaeger and Nick Lowery swapped third-quarter field goals as the Raiders went into the fourth period with a 21-10 lead.

The Chiefs pounded to a third-and-one on the Raiders' 11 midway through the third period, but a false start penalty on tackle Rich Baldinger cost them five yards. Anthony Smith tipped DeBerg's pass away from a receiver, forcing the Chiefs to settle for Lowery's 33-yarder.

The Raiders wasted an even better opportunity after Schroeder's 35-yard completion to Fernandez gave them first-and-goal from the six. But on third down, Schroeder's pass bounced off Tim Brown's chest in the end zone, and Jaeger connected from 22 yards.

$50 billion for B-2 bombers could fight crime

Slattery says heal divided society instead of building weapons of war

By the Associated Press

TOPEKA — The government could address social problems more effectively and reduce the federal debt at the same time if it would scrap development of the B-2 bomber, U.S. Rep. Jim Slattery said Monday.

The $50 billion the B-2 program will cost could be used to fight crime, drug abuse and the problems that have turned the nation into two societies, the 2nd District congressman told a statewide conference of the Kansas Correctional Association.

Slattery said saving the approximately $1 billion that a single B-2 costs could finance most of the $1.17 billion omnibus crime bill now in a House-Senate conference committee to resolve the differences between versions passed by the two houses of Congress.

"One B-2 bomber will pay for this bill," the five-term congressman from northeast Kansas told about 300 members from across Kansas attending the conference.

"Are we going to spend more billions on B-2 bombers or are we going to spend it on programs such as this?" Slattery said.

He said the $50 billion that could be saved by scrapping the B-2 bomber program could be used to fund critically needed social programs and reduce the federal debt.

"There are two societies in the United States, side-by-side but a million miles apart," Slattery said in plugging for more money for anti-crime, anti-drug and pro-education programs.

He said the United States has a "godawful" crime problem that the government must take the lead on to solve and Americans as individuals must pitch in to help fight.

"This is our duty as citizens of the greatest country on Earth," he said.

"This is a precarious time in our nation's history. The enemies within our society are becoming stronger. The streets of America are becoming battlegrounds."

He said those who are disenfranchised economically and socially "wage a war to challenge a society that hasn't paid attention to them."

The answer, the congressman said is to "get at the root of what is causing the crime."

"We need innovation solutions," he said, and one of them is to build "boot camps" for young drug offenders who have not been incarcerated previously for any length of time."

Lecturer discusses satanism

I WILL GO DIRECTLY TO HELL
AS A DEMON. I WILL TEMPT EARTH TO HAVE SEX, HAVE AND WORSHIP YOU. I BELIEVE
AGAIN RISE AND CONQUER

- Tommy Sullivan, Teen Satanist

Jon Rittenhouse, Christian researcher, shows a letter written by a sixteen-year-old who is in prison for killing his parents. Rittenhouse spoke about Satanism and the occult Tuesday in McCain Auditorium.

State funding determined by library vote

Legislators await message students send in referendum

JODELL LAMER
Staff Writer

Students will send a message to the Kansas Legislature when they vote on the Farrell Library expansion referendum during student government elections Nov. 5-6.

Brice Hobrock, dean of libraries, said the message will tell the legislators if students are willing and committed to improving Farrell Library.

"The student contribution is a necessary first step to attract state support," Hobrock said. "I'm quite certain the state will live up to their end of the bargain when the time comes."

The referendum will decide if $5 million of redirected student bond monies will be used to fund part of a proposed Farrell expansion and remodeling project. The money will be matched by an alumni contribution.

Hobrock said the state would then be expected to fund the remainder of the project, although a possible federal component is being investigated.

Hobrock said he is currently working to help Students Helping Enhance Library Funding in their efforts to inform students about the referendum.

Ray Kowalczewski, president of SHELFL, said the group has formed a coalition with the Rec Services Council.

"We've been going around and speaking with groups in the residence halls and we're going to speak with groups in the Greek houses," Kowalczewski said.

He said most students seem pretty receptive but ask how no increase in fees is possible with both projects.

Kowalczewski said he answers this by explaining how the bonds are expiring and being redirected toward new projects.

"Both projects are desperately needed at this time," he said. "An incredible window has been opened to us."

Other actions are being done to get student support.

A letter is being distributed to faculty members asking them to tell their students to vote on the issue, Hobrock said.

Hobrock said most students appear to be informed on the issue.

"I think most students do understand that there won't be any increase in fees—just an extension of existing fees," he said.

The bill authorizing the referendum also includes what Hobrock called an escape clause.

"The way the bill reads, if the alumni contribution and the state do not match the student commitment by 1996, the students would not make their contribution," he said.

He said the reason for this is that Farrell does not come up on the current plan that the University submits.

Christianity solution to preventing devil worshipping, Rittenhouse says

LAJEAN RAU
Campus Editor

More than 1,000 people packed McCain Auditorium Tuesday night to hear and talk about devil worship and the rise of satanism.

John Rittenhouse, 13-year staff member of Campus Crusade for Christ, the K-State chapter of which sponsored the lecture, attributed the revival of interest and practice in the areas of satanism and the occult to the erosion of traditional values.

Rittenhouse, who has spoken on the topic more than 100 times in the last three years, mostly to college audiences, said he did not expect or want everyone to believe what he said, but to evaluate and weigh it.

"Everyone has their own presuppositions. I'm going to do what few if any of your professors do in the classroom—that is to tell you what my presupposition is," Rittenhouse said.

"I am a Christian. I have a personal relationship with Christ. I accept the Bible as truth," he said. "And, I believe that Satan is a real and living spiritual creature, who is alive today and roaming the Earth."

The rise of satanism and occult activity is very real and not a figment of anyone's imagination, he said.

The basic belief structure of satanism is that all that is good is evil, all that is evil is good, and that each person is his or her own god, Rittenhouse said.

"The Satanic Bible" advocates, he said, indulgence rather than abstinence. Sins lead to physical, psychological or emotional pleasure, which is good.

He talked about Sean Sellers, Charles Manson, Tommy Sullivan and others—all proclaimed satanists and convicted murderers.

"Charles Manson said, 'I broke no laws—not God's, not man's. I am my own god, my own court, my own government, my own world,'" Rittenhouse said.

Rittenhouse added that although people may say satanism is a belief or religion, it is not OK to be a part of it.

"This is a free country," he said. "But, satanism is totally and completely contradictory to everything life-affirming. It is personally and socially destructive. It has no redeeming qualities at all."

Rittenhouse made a clear distinction between satanism and the occult.

Sociological reasons for people's involvement in the two are the breakdown of the traditional family and the alienation of individuals, he said.

He quoted one former satanist who said getting involved with satanism and the occult is the "ultimate cry for help."

Curiosity also plays a part. People have a fascination with evil—what makes people faint, vomit or have nightmares has a kind of magnetic charm, he said.

People also look for power. He said, however, the promises that one will benefit or gain supernatural powers is a lie.

Involvement with the drug culture, listening to black heavy-metal music and interest in occult phenomenon and activity are doorways to involvement in satanism and the occult.

"Am I saying that if you are part of a drug culture that you are a satanist or you will become a satanist?" he said.

"No. It is not a direct cause and effect but these things increase the chances."

He mentioned the bands King Diamond, Predator, Black Sabbath and Venom and read lyrics advocating or addressing satanic practices.

"This kind of music is not bad in and of itself," he said. "But don't buy the argument that, 'I listen to the words, but they don't influence me.'"

He also showed slides, some graphic, of satanistic and occult paraphernalia, photos, drawings, letters, poems, graffiti and newspaper

Palestine people to settle for autonomy

By the Associated Press

MADRID, Spain — In a marked departure from decades-old hard-line attitudes, Palestinians signaled Tuesday that they would settle for autonomy instead of demanding immediate statehood.

Faisal Husseini, the PLO-approved supervisor of the Palestinian negotiating team, said statehood remained the ultimate goal. But he said Palestinians would negotiate with Israel in the Middle East peace conference that opens today about limited self-rule for the 1.7 million Palestinians in the occupied West Bank and Gaza Strip.

Evident from Husseini's statement was that statehood has become the target of more realistic hopes rather than a condition that Israel would never accept. It underlined the evolving pragmatism among Palestinians, considerably weakened by the changing international political climate.

The Palestinians will demand Israel freeze settlement construction in the land seized from Jordan and Egypt in 1967 but will stay at the talks in Madrid no matter how tough the bargaining, delegates and advisers said.

The conference opens Wednesday with the Palestinians attending in a joint delegation with Jordan. They hope to have an independent team when bilateral talks begin between Israel and its adversaries—Jordan, the Palestinians, Syria and Lebanon.

The 14 Palestinian negotiators are led by Haidar Abdul-Shafi, a 71-year-old physician from Gaza. An advisory committee headed by Husseini is overseeing the official delegation.

Asked what the Palestinians were shooting for, Husseini said: "Autonomy for an interim period that will move us, Palestinians, from a people under occupation to a people with full independence and a Palestinian independent state that will later join in a confederation with Jordan."

Israel rejects the notion of a Palestinian state in the West Bank and Gaza Strip. But Israeli officials have said an agreement on autonomy could be a key achievement of the Madrid peace negotiations.

For an interim period, the Palestinians would accept the self-rule which Bush killing American dream

DONNA HEDKE
Collegian Reporter

President Bush's brave new world order rests on double standards and Orwellian doublespeak, said writer and lecturer Holly Sklar.

Sklar delivered the Lou Douglas Lecture Tuesday evening in the K-State Union Forum Hall on "The Brave New World Order and the Slow Death of the American Dream."

Sklar said while children are taught not to retaliate because two wrongs don't make a right, the U.S. government rushed to reverse the Iraqi invasion of Kuwait with military action, rather than waiting for sanctions and diplomacy to work.

LOU DOUGLAS

"In Iraq's case sanctions should have worked relatively quickly, setting a good example because most countries were united in enforcing them," she said.

She said the gulf war was used as a testing ground and trade show for U.S. military equipment to gain weapons customers.

"The purposeful proliferation of high technological weapons creates a self-fulfilling logic for new U.S. spending to keep ahead in this perpetual arms race," Sklar said.

She said Pentagon officials are going to the Soviet Union to help them convert the military-industrial complex to civilian uses, however, they should set a good example by shifting

Graduation goods available at Faire

The K-State Union Bookstore is trying to take the hassle out of paying for the tassel.

About 300 students attended the first Graduation Faire Tuesday in the K-State Union Courtyard.

Vendors displayed graduation apparel, announcements, class rings, Royal Purple yearbooks and wooden, engraved diplomas during the first day of the two-day Faire.

"The idea behind the Faire was to get people to think about graduation early," Union Bookstore Manager Kay Farley said.

Many students in the past have waited until the last minute to purchase graduation items, she said.

"If students wait until the last minute, it's not fun for them, and it's not fun for us," Farley said.

The Union Bookstore has offered these services in the past, but this is the first time graduates could get information about all the services in one day.

Students said the Faire was convenient.

"I think the Faire is a good idea. It's more organized," said Tina Rance, senior in graphic design.

Farley said a second Faire is planned for March 24 and 25 for spring graduates.

The Graduation Faire will continue today from 10 a.m. to 4 p.m. in the Union Courtyard.

Design students win $1,000, internships

K-State interior design students received first and third places in a student store planning design competition Oct. 13 and 14.

The competition was sponsored by the University of Missouri-Columbia and the Edison Menswear Group of St. Louis.

Three four-person teams from K-State's Department of Clothing, Textiles and Interior Design participated in the competition, which consisted of 17 teams from seven universities.

First-place honors went to the team of seniors Brent Aldridge, Regina Arment, Beatriz Blanco and Amy O'

Connor. They will receive $1,000 and an internship opportunity with the Edison Menswear Group.

Two K-State teams also tied for third place and won $250.

The competition's theme focused on planning a design for 8,555 square feet of retail space for "Earth stores," which specialize in environmentally healthy goods.

Ludwig Villasi, assistant professor of interior design, said participants in the 12-hour competition used state-of-the-art technology to create an interior design plan while considering environmental concerns.

Professor named Social Worker of Year

Janice Denning, assistant professor of social work, was recently named the 1991 Kansas Social Worker of the Year by the state chapter of the National Association for Social Workers.

Nominees for the award were critiqued on their work with "Strengthening Family Ties."

Betsy Walker, clinical section chief of the Irwin Army Community

Hospital's social work department at Fort Riley, said she nominated Denning for several reasons.

"I think Janice represents all of us as social workers in her qualities of professionalism and improving the lives of her students, clients and the community," Walker said.

Walker said she also nominated Denning for her work in the Kansas Family Preservation Training Project sponsored by Kansas Social and Rehabilitation Services.

The project was designed to train social workers to strengthen families and keep children in their own homes.

"Her (Denning's) role in the project was to mobilize financial resources to be channeled into helping to improve the quality of life of families that have dealt with life through violence," Walker said.

"Social Work With Families" is a class that exposes students to the new trends in child welfare and teaches some of the special skills necessary to practice with families.
